FROM the time that Quebec was invested by Montgomery and Arnold, at the close of the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-sive, until the termination of general Burgoyne's campaign, in the autumn of one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, the successes, the expectations, and the disappointments from that quarter, had been continually varying.

CHAP. XI.

Sir Guy Carleton, the governor of Canada, and who for a number of years had been commander in chief of all the British forces through that province, was an officer of approved fidelity, courage, and ability. He had fuccefsfully refifted the storm carried into that country by order of congress; he had triumphed in the premature fall of the intrepid, but unfortunate Montgomery; he had driven back the impetuous Arnold to the verge of the lakes; he had defeated the operations of general Thomson, in a bold and fuccessless attempt to surprise the British post at Trois Rivieres: general Thomson was there made a prisoner, with all of his party who escaped the fword. This happened about the time a detachment was marched northward, under the command of general Thomas. He died of the fmall-pox, as related above, when most of his army was destroyed by the fword, fickness, or flight.

Though general Carleton had occasionally employed some of the Indian allies of Great Britain, he had by his address kept back the numerous tribes of savages, near and beyond the distant lakes. He rather chose to hold them in expectation of being called to action, than to encourage their ferocious inclination for war, which they ever prosecute in those horrid forms, that shock humanity too much for description. Whether his checking the barbarity of the savages, or whether his lenity to the unfortunate Americans that had fallen into his hands, operated to his difadvantage, or whether from other political motives, is yet uncertain; however, he was fuperfeded in his military capacity, and the command given to general Burgoyne, who had re-embarked from England early in the fpring, and arrived at Quebec in the month of May, one thousand feven hundred and seventy-seven, with a large and chosen armament.

General Carleton felt the affront as a brave officer, confcious of having difcharged his truft with a degree of humanity on one fide, and the strictest fidelity to his master on the other. He immediately requested leave to quit the government, and repair to England. Yet he did not at once defert the fervice of his king: his influence was too great among the Canadians, and over all the Indian tribes, to hazard his absence at this critical conjuncture. His return to Europe was therefore postponed: he encouraged the provincials to aid his fuccesses, and exerted himself much more than heretofore, to bring on the innumerable hordes of the wildernefs. In confequence of this, they poured down from the forests in such multitudes, as to awaken apprehensions in his own breast of a very difagreeable nature; but he cajoled them to some terms of restraint; acted for a time in conjunction with Burgoyne, and made his arrangements in fuch a manner, as greatly to . 1777.

General Burgoyne was a gentleman of polite manners, literary abilities, and tried bravery; but haughty in his deportment, fanguine in opinion, and an inveterate foe to America from the beginning of the contest with Britain: this he had discovered as a member of the house of commons, as well as in the field. On his arrival in Canada he lost no time, but left a sufficient force for the protection of Quebec, and proceeded immediately across the lakes, at the head of eight or ten thousand men, including Canadians, and reached the neighbourhood of Crown Point before the last of June.

There, according to the barbarous system of policy adopted by his employers, though execrated by a minority in parliament, he fummoned the numerous tribes of favages to flaughter and bloodshed. A congress of Indians was convened, who met on the western side of Lake He gave them a war-feast, and Champlain. though his delicacy might not fuffer him to comply with their usual custom, and taste the goblet of gore by which they bind themselves to every ferocious deed, he made them a fpeech calculated to excite them to plunder and carnage, though it was speciously covered by some injunctions of pity towards the aged and infirm, who might experience the wretched fate of becoming their prisoners. Yet, he so CHAP. XI. far regarded the laws of humanity, as to advife the favages to tomahawk only fuch as were found in arms for the defence of their country, and gave fome encouragement to their bringing in prisoners alive, instead of exercising that general maffacre usual in all their conflicts; nor would he promife a reward for the fcalps of those who were killed merely to obtain the bounty.

Having thus as he supposed, secured the fidelity of favages, whom no laws of civilization can bind, when in competition with their appetite for revenge and war, he published a poinpous and ridiculous proclamation. In this he exhorted the inhabitants of the country, wherever he fhould march, immediately to fubmit to the clemency of his royal mafter. To quicken their obedience, he oftentatiously boafted, that " he had but to lift his arm, and "beckon by a stretch thereof;" the innumerable hordes of the wilderness, who stood ready to execute his will, and pour vengeance on any who should yet have the temerity to counteract the authority of the king of England. He concluded his proclamation with these memorable threats :- "I trust I shall stand acquitted "in the eyes of God and man, in denouncing "and executing the vengeance of the state "against the wilful outcasts: the messengers of " justice and of wrath await them in the field,

"and devastation, famine, and every concomitant horror that a reluctant, but indispensable "prosecution of military duty must occasion, "will bar the way to their return."*

After these preliminary steps, general Burgoyne pushed forward with his whole force, and possessed himself of Ticonderoga without the finallest opposition. This was a strong post commanded by general St. Clair, an officer always unfortunate, and in no instance ever diftinguished for bravery or judgment. Though the Americans here were inferior in numbers to the British, they were not so deficient in men as in arms, more particularly mufquetry and bayonets: but their works were ftrong, the troops healthy, and they had just received a reinforcement of men, and a fresh supply of every thing else necessary for defence. In these circumstances, there could scarcely be found a fufficient excuse for calling a hasty council of war, and drawing off by night five or fix thousand men, on the first approach of the enemy. The want of fmall-arms was the only plaufible pretence offered by the commander to justify his conduct. This deficiency St. Clair must have known before the fifth of

It is not probable the Americans could have long kept their ground against the superiority of the British officers, and the number and discipline of their troops; yet undoubtedly meafures might have been early taken by a judicious commander, to have retreated if necessary, without fo much difgrace, and the total lofs of their artillery, ftores, provisions, their shipping on the lake, and many valuable lives. The order for retreat was unexpected to the army: they had scarce time to secure a part of their baggage. The flight was rapid, and the purfuit vigorous. The foldiers having loft all confidence in their commander, the out-posts were every where evacuated, and a general difmay pervaded the fugitives, who, in fcattered parties, were routed in every quarter, and driven naked into the woods.

* About this time a misfortune befel the Americans not far distant from Montreal, at a place called the Cedars. There major Butterfield with his party, were compelled to furrender prisoners of war. This party captured by captain Forster who commanded the British, consisted of four or five hundred men. It was warmly disputed afterwards, between congress and the British commanders, whether the Cedars men, who were permitted to depart on parole, should be exchanged for British prisoners taken under Burgoyne.

After two days wandering in the wilderness, the largest body of the Americans who had kept together, were overtaken and obliged to make a stand against a party that much outnumbered them, commanded by colonel Frazer, who had been indefatigable in the pursuit. The action continued three or four hours, when the Americans, though they fought with bravery, were totally routed with very great loss. Colonel Francis, the gallant commander of this party was killed, with many other officers of merit; two or three hundred privates were left dead on the field, thrice that number wounded or taken prisoners: most of the wounded perished miserably in the woods. The British lost several officers highly esteemed by them, among whom was major Grant, a man of decided bravery. Yet general Burgoyne found to his cost, his incapacity to execute the boast he had some time before made in the house of commons, that "fo little was "to be apprehended from the refistance of the "colonies, that he would engage to drive the "continent with five hundred disciplined " troops."

General St. Clair had made good his own retreat fo far, as to be fix miles ahead with the van of the routed army. Such was his terror on hearing of the defeat of colonel Francis, and some other successes of the royal army, that instead of proceeding to fort Ann, as intended, he shrunk off into the woods, uncertain where to fly for security. Another party of the Americans, who had reached fort Ann, were attacked and reduced by colonel Hill, with one British regiment. They set fire to the fortress themselves, to prevent its falling into the hands of the victors, and sled with the utmost speed towards fort Edward, on the Hudson. General St. Clair, and the miserable remains of his army who escaped death, either by fatigue or the sword, after a march of seven days, through mountainous and unfrequented passages, harassed in the rear, and almost without provisions of any kind, arrived at fort Edward in a most pitiable condition.

General Burgoyne was too much the experienced officer to neglect his advantages. He pushed forward with equal alacrity and success; and in spite of the embarrassiments of bad roads, mountains, thickets, and swamps, he reached the neighbourhood of fort Edward, within a few days after the broken remnant of St. Clair's army had posted themselves there. On his approach, the Americans immediately decamped from fort Edward, under the command of general Schuyler, whom they sound there, and withdrew to Saratoga. He had been making some efforts to collect the militia from the country contiguous, to aid and support the routed corps; but on their advance, he did not think it prudent to face the British troops.

A fhare of the public odium on this occasion fell on general Schuyler. His conduct, as well as the delinquency of general St. Clair, was very heavily censured. They were both ordered, with some other of the principal officers of the late council of war at Ticonderoga, to repair to congress to answer for the loss of that fort, and the command of the Lake Champlain. On the other hand, it was no small triumph to general Burgoyne and his army, thus to have chased the Americans from the province of Canada, to find themselves in possession of all the lakes, and to see the British standard erected on the Hudson, which had long been an object of importance with administration.

Exaggerated accounts of the weakness of the Americans, the incapacity of their officers, and the timidity of the troops, were transmitted to England; and the most fanguine expectations formed by people of every description through the island. They were ready to imagine, that hunted from post to post, both in the northern and southern departments, the spirits of the colonists must be broken, their resources fail, and that the United States thus repeatedly disappointed, would lose all energy of opposition, and soon fall a prey to the pride and power of Great Britain. But notwithstanding the unhappy CHAP. XI derangement of their affairs at the northward, and the fuccesses of general Howe at the fouthward, there appeared not the fmallest inclination among the people at large, throughout the American states, to submit to royal authority. The untoward circumstances that had taken place, neither exhaufted their hopes, nor damped the ardor of enterprife. The dangers that lowered in every quarter, feemed rather to invigorate the public mind, and quicken the operations of war.

On the defeat of St. Clair, and the advance of the British army, the eastern states immediately draughted large detachments of militia, and hastened them forward. Congress directed general Washington to appoint proper officers, to repair to Saratoga and take the command. They also appointed a court of inquiry to take cognizance of the delinquency of the fuspended officers: but their influence was too great with the commander in chief, and fome principal members of congress, to subject them to that measure of degradation which it was generally thought they deferved. They were difmiffed, though not with approbation, yet without any fevere cenfure; but as the conduct of St. Clair was difgraceful, and that of Schuyler could not be justified, they were neither of them appointed to active fervice.

General Gates, a brave and experienced officer formerly in British service, a man of open manners, integrity of heart, and undifguifed republican principles, was vested with the chief command to act against Burgoyne. On his arrival at Saratoga, he drew back the army, and encamped at a place called Stillwater, where he could more conveniently observe the motions of colonel St. Ledger, who was advancing to the Mohawk River, to invest fort Stanwix. This post was commanded by colonel Gansevoort, whose bravery and intrepidity did honor to himself and to his country. General Arnold was fent on with a reinforcement from the continental army, and a large train of artillery, to the aid of general Gates. He was ordered to leave the main body, and march with a detachment towards the Mohawk River to the affiftance of Ganfevoort: but before there was time fufficient for his relief from any quarter, this gallant officer found himfelf and the garrison furrounded by a large body of British troops, in conjunction with a formidable appearance of favages, yelling in the environs, and thirsting for blood. At the same time he was threatened by their more enlightened, yet not more humanized allies, that unless he immediately furrendered the garrison, or if he delayed until it was taken by ftorm, they should all be given up to the fury of the Indians, who were bent upon the massacre of every officer and foldier.

St. Ledger by letters, meffages, and all poffi- CHAP. XI. ble methods, endeavoured to intimidate the commander of the fortress. He observed, that the favages were determined to wreak their vengeance for the recent lofs of fome of their chiefs, on the inhabitants of the Mohawk River, and to fweep the young plantations there, without distinction of age or fex. He made an exaggerated display of his own strength, of the power and fuccess of Burgoyne, and the hopeless state of the garrison, unless by a timely fubmission they put themselves under his protection. On this condition, he promifed to endeavour to mitigate the barbarity of his Indian coadjutors, and to foften the horrors usually attendant on their victories.

Colonel Gansevoort, instead of listening to any propofals of furrender, replied, "that en-"trusted by the United States with the charge " of the garrifon, he should defend it to the "last extremity, regardless of the consequences "of doing his duty." Their danger was greatly enhanced by the misfortune of general Harkimer, who had marched for the relief of fort Stanwix, but with too little precaution. At the head of eight or nine hundred militia, he fell into an ambufcade confifting mostly of Indians, and notwithstanding a manly defence, few of them escaped. They were furrounded, routed, and butchered, in all the barbarous fhapes of favage brutality, after many of them had become their prisoners, and their scalps carried to their British allies, to receive the ftipulated price. A vigorous fally from the garrison, conducted by colonel Willet of New York, and his fuccessful return with a number of prisoners, gave the first information of the failure of Harkimer. This inftead of difcouraging, inspirited to fresh enterprise. The valiant Willet, in contempt of danger and difficulty, hazarded a passage by night through the enemy's works, and traverfed the unexplored and pathless wilderness for upwards of fifty miles, to the more inhabited fettlements, in order to raife the country to haften to the relief of the garrifon, and the protection of the inhabitants scattered along the borders of the Mohawk River.

CHAP. XI.

General Arnold had marched with a thoufand men for the relief of the belieged; but though in his usual character he made all possible dispatch, the gallant Gansevoort had two days before his arrival, repulsed the assailants, and obliged them to retreat in such disorder, that it had all the appearance of a slight. In consequence of this, St. Ledger was obliged to relinquish the siege with so much precipitation, that they lest their tents, stores, and artillery behind them, and their camp-kettles on the sire. This movement was hurried on by the sullen and untractable behaviour of the Indians; which rose to such a height, as to give him reason to be apprehensive for his own CHAP. XI. fafety. His fears were well founded: their conduct had become fo outrageous, that it was not in the power of fir John Johnson, Butler, and other influential friends of the favages, to keep them within any bounds. They frequently plundered the baggage of the British officers; and when an opportunity offered the flightest advantage, they murdered their British or German allies, with the same brutal ferocity with which they imbrued their hands in the blood of Americans.

The next movement of importance made by general Burgoyne, was an attempt to get poffession of the little obscure town of Bennington, lying in the Hampshire Grants among the Green Mountains, and made confiderable only by the deposit of a large quantity of cattle, provisions, carriages, and other necessaries for the use of the American army. For the purpose of seizing these, as well as to intimidate the people in that quarter, by the magnitude of his power and the extent of his designs, he detached a party of Hessians, with a few loyalists and fome Indians, to the amount of fifteen hundred, and gave the command to colonel Baum, a German officer. He was commissioned, after he had furprifed Bennington, to ravage the adjacent country, and if possible to persuade the inhabitants, that he was in force fufficient, and that he defigned to march on to Connecticut CHAP. XI.

River, in the road to Boston. He was ordered to inform them, that the main body of the British army was in motion for the same purpose,* that they were to be joined at Springsfield by a detachment from Rhode Island, and that by their irresistible power, they meant to bring the rebellious Americans to due submission, or to sweep the whole country.

It is aftonishing that a man of general Burgoyne's understanding and military experience, should iffue orders so absurd and impracticable. He must have been very little acquainted with the geography of the country, and lefs with the spirit of the inhabitants, to have supposed that a detachment of fifteen hundred men, could march from Saratoga till they reached Connecticut River, take post at a variety of places, levying taxes on the inhabitants, making demands of provisions, cattle, and all other necessaries for the use of his army, without any refiftance; thence to proceed down the river to Brattleborough, and to return by another road and take post at Albany: and this bufiness to be completed in the short term of a fortnight. Nor did he discover less ignorance, if he expected that a detachment was to leave Rhode Island, and march through the country to Springfield on the fame defign, and from thence to meet colonel Baum at Albany.

^{*} See general Burgoyne's orders to colonel Baum, Apspendix, Note No. I.

It is impossible to suppose, that so renowned CHAP. XI. a commander as general Burgoyne, could mean to deceive or embarrass his officers, by his orders; but if he flattered himfelf that they could be executed, he must still have cherished the opinion that he once uttered in the house of commons, that four or five thousand British troops could march through the continent, and reduce the rebellious states to a due submission to the authority of parliament. In this march, Burgoyne ordered all acting in committees, or in any other capacity under the direction of congress, to be made prisoners.

These pompous orders and bombastic threats, were far from fpreading the alarm and panic they were defigned to excite. The adjacent country was immediately in motion, and all feemed animated with the boldest resolution in defence of the rights of nature, and the peaceable possession of life and property. When colonel Baum had arrived within four miles of Bennington, appearances gave him reason to. apprehend, that he was not fufficiently strong to make an attack on the place. He judged it more prudent to take post on a branch of the river Hoofuck, and by express inform general Burgoyne of his fituation, and the apparent difficulty of executing his orders with only fifteen hundred men.

In confequence of this information, an additional party, principally Waldeckers, were fent on under the command of colonel Breyman. But before he could furmount the unavoidable impediments of marching over bad and unfrequented roads, and reach the camp of his friends and his countrymen, a body of militia commanded by general Starks, had preffed forward, attacked, routed, and totally defeated colonel Baum, in the neighbourhood of Bennington. General Starks in his early youth, had been used to the alarm of war: his birthplace was on the borders of New Hampshire, which had been long fubject to the incursions of the favages: when a child he was captured by them, and adopted as one of their own, but after a few years restored. He led a regiment to the field in one thousand seven hundred and feventy-five, and distinguished himself as a soldier. On the new arrangement of the army, he retired as a citizen. His manners were plain, honest, and severe, excellently calculated for the benefit of fociety in the private walks of life; but as a man of principle, he again left the occupation of the hufbandman, when his country was in danger. On Burgoyne's approach, he voluntarily marched to the state of Vermont, at the head of the militia, and immortalized his name by his fignal fuccess at Bennington, in one of the darkest periods of the American war.

Bennington, the present scene of action, was the first settlement in the territory of Vermont, which was as recent as the year one thousand seven hundred and fixty-nine. This was made by the possessor of the tracts called the New Hampshire Grants, a robust and hardy set of men, collected from the borders, and under the jurisdiction, of the provinces of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York. Rough, bold, and independent, these people, generally denominated the Green Mountain Boys, were brave and active, not only in the present consists, but were eminently useful to their country by their intrepidity and valor, to the conclusion of the American war.*

Governor Skeene, a fingular character, who had been a colonel in one of the king's regiments, had obtained a commission from the crown, to act as governor at and about Lake Champlain, had assumed a jurisdiction over the Hampshire Grants, and acted as companion and guide to colonel Baum in the expedition. He fled on the first appearance of danger, as did the loyalists, the Canadian provincials, and the Indians. Baum was wounded and taken prifoner, and his whole corps captured by this small body of American militia. Colonel Breyman, who arrived in the afternoon of the same day, escaped a similar sate only by slight, after a short and brave defence, and the loss of most of his men.

This memorable event would perhaps at any other period, have appeared of less moment; but when so renowned a commander as general Burgoyne, in the zenith of success and the pride of victory, was threatening with the aid of his savage adherents, to execute all the deeds of borror enjoined by his employers, a repulse from so unexpected a quarter, was humiliating indeed: it gave a new turn to the face of the campaign. The success at Bennington took place on the sixteenth of August, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven.

On the first rumor of this action through the country, the loyalists, who in great numbers still resided among the opposers of royal authority, affected every where to cast over it the shade of ridicule. They alleged that the raw militia of Hampshire, and Starks their commander, must have been too much awed by the name and prowess of general Burgoyne, and his experienced veterans, to attempt any thing of consequence: nor were they convinced of the truth of the report, until they faw the prisoners on their way to Boston. But the people at large, who appeared to have been waiting with a kind of enthusiastic expectation, for some fortunate event that might give a spring to action, at once gave full credit to the account, and magnished this success in strains of the highest exultation and defiance, and in the warmth of imagination, anticipated new victories.

CHAP. XI.

It is certain that from this moment, fortune feemed to have changed her face. Whether the fpirits of the British officers and troops flagged in equal proportion, as the enthusiasm for glory and victory feemed to rekindle in the bosoms of their antagonists, or whether general Burgoyne was restricted by orders, that obliged him in some instances to act against his own better informed judgment, his success terminated with the capture of fort Edward.

By fome of his letters written foon after this, to the minister of the American department, the situation of the British army began to appear to general Burgoyne exceedingly critical. He intimated his apprehensions; and with an air of despondency, in one of them he observed, "that circumstances might require, that he and "the army should be devoted; and that his or-"ders were so peremptory, that he did not "think himself authorised to call a council of "war, with regard to his prefent move"ments."* It was doubtless thought necessary at all hazards, to prevent the forces under general Gates, from being at leifure to join general Washington. It was also a favorite point with the ministry, that Burgoyne should push on to Albany. But however dubious the prospect might then appear to himself, or whatever might be his own expectations, general Burgoyne thought proper to pass the Hudson, and about the middle of September, he encamped on the heights and plains of Saratoga.

Supported by a number of brave, experienced, and most approved officers in British service, a large armament of British, Hessians, and provincials, with a prodigious train of artillery, and his copper-colored fcouts and allies, he with all industry prepared to offer battle, and try the fortune of war in a general engagement. The Americans in equal readiness for action, marched from their camp on the nineteenth, and at a place called Stillwater, attacked the right wing of the British army, commanded by Burgoyne himself. Meeting a repulse, they turned their whole force to the left, commanded by the baron Redeifel, and supported by general Phillips, at the head of a formidable artillery. The Americans fustained the combat for feveral hours, against officers of distinguished bravery, and more experience than themselves, who commanded some of the best troops the princes of Germany, or even the monarch of Britain could boast; but evening advancing, without decided advantage, the loss of men being nearly equal on both sides, the Americans retreated, and recovered their camp with little interruption.

The British troops lay on their arms through the night, and in the morning took an advantageous polition, and fpread themselves along a meadow, in full view, and almost within cannon-shot of the American camp. Here general Burgoyne received intelligence from fir Henry Clinton, that he had embarked for the North River, with feveral thousand troops, in order to make a diversion in his favor, that might greatly facilitate his operations. This account flattered the former expectations of Burgoyne; who judged that general Gates would be obliged to divide his army, to fuccour the diffressed villages on each fide the Hudson, now exposed to the most cruel ravages. Expectation was again raifed, and the British army invigorated by fresh hopes, that a junction at Albany might foon be effected.

With these ideas, general Burgoyne found means to dispatch several messages by private ways, through the woods to general Clinton CHAP, XI.

The purport of these was, "that if possible to "remain unmolested, he should keep his pre"fent position a few days longer; when prob"ably the American army might be weakened
"by the necessity of detachments for other ser"vice." He was further strengthened in the ideas of success, by a recent disappointment of the Americans in an attempt to recover Ticonderoga. Had this enterprise succeeded, it would at once effectually have prevented the retreat of the British army, which began to be contemplated.

The business was principally committed to the direction of general Lincoln, and profecuted with vigor by the colonels Brown, Johnson, Woodbury, and other spirited officers. They paffed the mountains between Skeenfborough and Lake George, in fo rapid and private a manner, that before any intimation of the bufiness was diffeminated, they seized the out-posts, captured the armed veffels and a number of boats on the lake, and with four companies of foot and a party of Canadians, they took poffession of Mount Independence, and summoned the garrifon in Ticonderoga to furrender. This was gallantly refused, and the fortress bravely defended, by brigadier general Powell. The Americans made feveral efforts to from the garrison; but repulsed with resolution and valor, they found themselves not in force sufficient for farther trial; and after a few days, they relinquished the design, and retired.

Yet notwithstanding the rebuff and retreat from Ticonderoga, with the advantages the British affected to claim from the action at Stillwater, and the flattering encouragement received from fir Henry Clinton, general Burgoyne was still involved in complicated difficulties. The dangers he had to encounter, increased on every side. Fresh troops of militia were continually reinforcing the army of his enemies; while his own daily lessened by the desertion of the Canadian militia, the provincial loyalists, and the desection of the Indians.

These last grew sullen from the disappointment of plunder, and were irritated from the notice general Burgoyne was obliged in honor to take, of the barbarous murder of a miss McGrea; on which many of them drew off in disgust. This beautiful young lady, dressed in her bridal habiliments, in order to be married the same evening to an officer of character in Burgoyne's own regiment, while her heart glowed in expectation of a speedy union with the beloved object of her affections, was induced to leave a house near fort Edward, with the idea of being escorted to the present residence of her intended husband, and was massacred on the way, in all the cold-blooded ferocity of favage manners. Her father had uniformly been a zealous loyalist: but it was not always in the power of the most humane of the British officers, to protect the innocent from the barbarity of their savage friends.

General Burgoyne was shocked by the tragic circumstances that attended the fate of this lovely, unfortunate girl; but he attempted to palliate the crime, though he did not neglect an endeavour to inslict due punishment on the perpetrators. Yet such was the temper of his Indian adherents, that instead of inslicting death, he was obliged to pardon the guilty chiefs, notwithstanding the cry of justice, and the grief and resentment of her lover.* The best coloring that could be given the affecting tale was, that two of the principal warriors, under a pretence of guarding her person, had, in a mad quarrel between themselves, which was best entitled to the prize, or to the honor of the escort, made the blooming beauty, shivering in the distress of innocence, youth, and despair, the victim of their fury. The helpless maid was butchered and scalped, and her bleeding corpse left in the woods, to excite the tear of every beholder.

* The earl of Harrington observed in evidence on Burgoyne's trial, that it was his opinion and that of other officers, that when general Burgoyne threatened the culprit with death, and insisted that he should be delivered up, that it might have been attended with dangerous consequences. Many gentlemen of the army besides himself believed, that motives of policy alone, prevented him from putting this threat in execution; and that if he liad not pardoned the murderer, which he did, the total defection of the Indians would have ensued. He observed, that "the consequences on their return through Canada might have been dreadful: not to speak of the weight they would have thrown into the opposite scale, had they gone over to the enemy, which I rather imagine would "have been the case."

In addition to the complicated embarraffments the British commander had to conflict, provisions grew fhort in the camp; he was obliged to lessen their rations, and put his foldiers on allowance. The most he could hope, as he observed himself in a letter to sir Henry Clinton, was to hold out to the twelfth of October, or effect a retreat before, in the best posfible manner. The last expedient he foon found impracticable, by the precaution taken by general Gates, to guard all the passes, to cut off all fupplies, and nearly to furround the British army. In this uncertain and diffressed situation, general Burgoyne waited with all the anxiety of a faithful fervant, and the caution and vigilance of an able commander, from the action on the nineteenth of September until the feventh of October, without any nearer prospect of a diversion in his favor. He then found it necessary to make a general movement, either to decide the fate of his brave officers and men in the field of battle, by a general engagement, or force a retreat.

General Gates equally prepared, either for attack or defence, a warm engagement enfued, which proved fatal to many of the best officers in the British line; but after a sharp conslict of feveral hours, and the highest exhibitions of military prowefs, the British found it necessary to recover their camp before evening, which they did in fome diforder. They had fcarcely entered it when it was stormed on every side. Lord Balcarras with his light infantry, and a part of the British line, were ordered to throw themselves into the intrenchments, which they executed with spirit, and made a gallant and resolute defence. But the action led on by the ardent and undaunted Arnold, who acquitted himfelf with his usual intrepidity, was vigoroully pushed in spite of the most valiant oppofition, until almost in the moment of victory, Arnold was dangeroufly wounded, and his party obliged to retreat. The Americans were fortunate enough to carry the intrenchment of the German referve, commanded by colonel Breyman, who was killed in the engagement. All the artillery and equipage of the brigade, and about two hundred officers and privates were captured.

The engagement was continued through the whole of this fated day, which closed the scene of conflict and mortality on many brave men, and a number of officers of diftinguished valor. The first in name who fell, was brigadier general Frazier. "Before his death, general Fra-"zier requested, that his body might be carried "to his grave by the field-officers of his own "corps, without any parade, and buried there. "About funfet, the body was brought up the "hill, attended only by the officers of his own "family. They passed in view of the greatest "part of both armies. Struck with the humil-"ity of the scene, some of the first oslicers of "the army joined the procession, as it were "from a natural propenfity, to pay the last at-"tention to his remains,

Colonel Breyman, and fir James Clark, aidde-camp to general Burgoyne, were also killed.

^{*} Extracted from a letter of general Burgoyne.

Major Ackland was dangerously wounded, and taken prisoner. Lady Ackland, whose conjugal affection had led her to accompany her husband through all the dangers and fatigues of a campaign in the wilderness, was a woman of the most delicate frame, of the genteelest manners, habituated to all the fost elegancies, and refined enjoyments, that attend high birth and fortune. Her sufferings exhibit a story so affecting to the mind of sensibility, that it may apologize for a short interlude, in the most interesting detail of military transactions.

She had accompanied major Ackland to Canada in one thousand seven hundred and feventy-fix. After which she traversed a vast woody country, in the most extreme seasons, to visit her husband sick in a poor hut at Chamblee. On the opening of the campaign of one thousand seven hundred and seventyfeven, the positive injunction of her husband, prevented her risking the hazards expected before Ticonderoga. There major Ackland was badly wounded, on which she crossed the Champlain to attend him. She followed his fortune and shared his fatigues, through the dreary way to fort Edward, there lodged in a miserable tent, which by accident took fire by night, when both major Ackland and herself were faved by an orderly ferjeant, who dragged them from the flames almost before they awaked ...

Lady Ackland loft not her resolution or her CHAP. XI. cheerfulness by the dangers she had encountered; but accompanied her foldier to the action on the nineteenth of September. By his order, she had followed the route of the artillery and baggage, where she would be least exposed, until fhe alighted at a fmall uninhabited tent, which, when the action became general, the furgeons took possession of to dress their wounded.

Thus, within hearing of the roar of cannon, when the knew the fituation of her beloved husband was in the most exposed part of the action, she waited some hours in a situation, and in apprehensions not easily described. The baroness of Reidesel, and the wives of the majors Harnage and Reynal were with her; but she derived little comfort from their presence. Major Harnage was foon brought into the tent dangerously wounded, accompanied with the tidings of the death of the husband of Mrs. Reynal. Let imagination paint the mifery of this little group of diffressed females. Here among the wounded and the dying, lady Ackland with her usual ferenity, stood prepared for new trials, until the fatal feventh of October, when her fortitude was put to the feverest test, by the intelligence that the British army was defeated, and that major Ackland was defperately wounded, and taken prisoner. Not borne down by grief or anxiety, she the next day requested leave to attend the wounded prisoner, to the last moment of his life.

General Burgoyne, from whose narrative fome circumstances of lady Ackland's story are felected, observes, "that though he had expe-"rienced, that patience and fortitude in a fu-"preme degree, were to be found, as well as every other virtue, under the most tender "forms, he was aftonished at this proposal. "After fo long an exposure and agitation of the spirits, exhausted not only for want of "rest, but absolutely for want of food, drench-"ed in rain for twelve hours together, that a "woman should be capable of delivering her-"felf to the enemy, probably in the night, and " uncertain what hands she should fall into, ap-"peared an effort above human nature." He adds, "he had not a cup of wine to offer her: " all with which the hapless lady could be fur-"nished, was a little rum and dirty water, an " open boat, and a few lines to general Gates."

Thus this lady left the British lines, attended only by Mr. Brudenell, chaplain to the artillery, the major's valet-de-chambre, and one female servant. She was rowed down the river to meet the enemy, when her distresses thickened anew. The night advanced before she met the out-posts: the centinel would neither let the boat pass, nor the passengers come on fhore, notwithstanding the singular state of this CHAP. XI. heroic lady was pathetically reprefented by Mr. Brudenell: apprehensive of treachery, the centinel threatened to fire into the boat, if they attempted to stir until the appearance of day. Thus, through a dark and cold night, far advanced in a ftate that always requires peculiar tenderness to the fex, with a heart full of anxiety for her wounded husband, she was obliged to fubmit, and in this perilous fituation, to reflect until the dawn of the morning, on her own wretched condition, and the uncertainty of what reception she should meet from strangers in hostile array, slushed with victory, and and informed him that this line of conduct would have been observed, without a letter from the British commander, not only to this lady, but to others of his unfortunate friends, languishing under their wounds; that the American commanders needed not a request, to excite their humanity to the unfortunate, who by the chances of war, had been thrown on their compassion. In the same letter he reminded general Burgoyne, "that the cruelties "which marked the late effort for the retreat of his army, were almost without a precedent among civilized nations; and that an "endeavour to ruin, where they could not conquer, betrayed more the vindictive spirit of the monk, than the generosity of the soldier."*

Notwithstanding the misfortunes and the losses of the preceding day, general Burgoyne did not yet totally despair of retrieving his affairs and his honor, by another general engagement. This he endeavoured to effect on the eighth, and in this he was again disappointed. The utmost bravery was exhibited on both sides, but no decided action. Several days passed on in defultory skirmishes: spirit and intrepidity were not wanting on either side; while the one had every thing to hope and in-

In this fituation, the British commander judged the best expedient was, a second effort to repass the Hudson, and retreat to fort Edward. To this every impediment was thrown in his way. A retreat was rendered impracticable, by the number and vigilance of the Americans: the borders of the river were lined with troops; and detachments pushed forward to cut off all hope of retreat on every side. The condition of the British army grew hourly more desperate: winter was approaching, their provisions spent, the troops exhausted by continual satigue; and not the smallest prospect of relief appeared from any quarter.

In this deplorable fituation, general Burgoyne fummoned a grand council of war, in which, as he ftood in need of every advice, not only the field-officers, but the fubalterns had a voice. It was unanimously judged most prudent, in the humiliated and hopeless condition to which they were reduced, to open a treaty of convention, and endeavour to obtain some honorable terms of surrender. General Gates was acknowledged by all, not only the valiant, but the humane and generous soe: they had no doubt he would mitigate their mortification, as far as the laws of war or of honor would permit, from the victor to the vanquished.

CHAP. XI.

In confequence of this determination, the folemn negociation took place on the thirteenth of October. General Burgoyne intimated to the American commander, that he wished to fend a field-officer to him, to confer on matters of the highest moment, and requested to know when he might be received. General Gates really possessed that humanity, which distinguishes the hero from the affaffinator of the feelings of wounded honor. He seemed touched by the request, with that fympathy which ever refides in the bosom of generofity; and replied inftantly, that an officer from general Burgoyne should be received at the advanced post of the army of the United States, at ten o'clock the next morning.

Major Kingston was accordingly fent at the appointed time, and was conducted to the headquarters of the American army. The purport of the meffage was, that lieutenant general Burgoyne, having twice fought general Gates, had determined on a third conflict; but well apprifed of the fuperiority of numbers, and the disposition of the American troops, he was convinced, that either a battle or a retreat, would be a fcene of carnage on both fides. In this fituation he was impelled by humanity, and thought himself justified by established principles of states and of war, to spare the lives of brave men, upon honorable terms. Should general Gates be inclined to treat upon those. ideas, general Burgoyne would propose a cessation of arms, during the time necessary to settle such preliminaries, as he could abide by in any extremity.

CHAP. XI.

A convention was immediately opened. A discussion of some articles proposed by the American commander, which appeared to the British officers inadmissible, occasioned a delay of two or three days: these being accommodated, a treaty of surrender was signed the seventeenth of October, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven. The substance of the treaty was,

That the troops under the command of general Burgoyne, should march out of their camp with the honors of war, and the artillery of the intrenchment, to the verge of a certain river, where the arms and the artillery should be piled at the command of one of their own officers:

That a free passage should be provided for the army to return to England, on condition that they should not serve again in America, during the present contest: that transports should enter the port of Boston for their reception, whenever general Howe should think proper to request it: and that they should be quartered near Boston, that no delay might take place, when an order for embarkation arrived:

That the Canadians of every description, should be permitted to return immediately, on the sole condition of their not again arming against the United States:

That the army under general Burgoyne should march to the Massachusetts by the nearest route: they should be supplied with provisions, both on their route and in quarters, at the same rate of rations, by order of general Gates, as that of his own army:

That the officers should wear their side arms, and be lodged according to their rank; nor at any time be prevented assembling their own troops, according to the usual military regulations:

That paffports should be granted to such officers as general Burgoyne should appoint, immediately to carry dispatches to sir William Howe, to general Carleton, and to England by the way of New York: and that general Gates should engage on the public faith, that none of the dispatches should be opened.

After the fecond article it was stipulated, that if a cartel should take place, by which the army under general Burgoyne, or any part of it, might be exchanged, the second article should be void, as far as such exchange should be made.

These and several other circumstances of less CHAP. St. moment agreed to, the convention was figned, with much folemnity.

After the negociation was finished and completed, by the mutual fignature of the officers, general Gates conducted not only as an officer of bravery, punctuality, and a nice fense of military honor, but with the fine feelings of humanity, and the delicacy of the gentleman. He carried these ideas so far, as to restrain the curiofity and pride of his own army, by keeping them within their lines, while the British were piling their arms. He did not fuffer a man among them, to be a near witness to the humiliating fight, of a haughty and once powerful foe, difarming and divefting themselves of the infignia of military diffinction, and laying them at the feet of the conqueror.

Thus, to the consternation of Britain, to the universal joy of America, and to the gratification of all capable of feeling that dignity of fentiment, that leads the mind to rejoice in the prospect of liberty to their fellow-inen, was the northern expedition finished. A reverse of fortune was now beheld, that had not fallen under the calculation of either party.

It is more eafy to conjecture, than agreeable to describe, the chagrin of a proud, assuming foe, who had imperiously threatened to penetrate and lay waste cities and provinces, thus humbled by the arms of a people they had asfected to hold in the utmost contempt, and their laurels thus saded beneath the sword of the victorious Americans.

It was a tale without example in British annals, that fo many thousands* of their best troops, in conjunction with a large body of German auxiliaries, commanded by generals and field-officers of the first character, accompanied by many young gentlemen of noble family and military talents, should be thus reduced, mortified, and led captive, through a long extent of country, where they had flattered themfelves they should parade in triumph. They were obliged before they reached their deftined quarters, to traverse the pleasant grounds, pass through many flourishing towns, and growing fettlements, where they had expected to plant the flandard of royalty, in all the cruel infolence of victory, to the utter extermination of every republican principle.

The British army, with general Burgoyne at their head, was escorted from the plains of Saratoga, to their quarters at Cambridge, about three hundred miles, by two or three American field-officers, and a handful of foldiers, as a guard. The march was folemn, fullen, and filent; but they were every where treated with fuch humanity, and even delicacy, that themfelves acknowledged, the civil deportment of the inhabitants of the country, was without a parallel. They thought it remarkable, that not an infult was offered, nor an opprobrious reflection cast, that could enhance the misery of the unfortunate, or wound the feelings of degraded honor. Yet they were destined to a long captivity, from various circumstances that arose, relative to the punctual observance of some of the articles of the treaty of convention, which will be noticed in their place.

As foon as general Gates had finished the campaign of Saratoga, which terminated with so much eclat to himself, and so much glory to the arms of his country, he wrote a spirited letter to general Vaughan, who had been for some months ravaging, plundering, and burning, with unparalleled barbarity, the settlements on the North River. He informed him, that "not-"withstanding he had reduced the sine village "of Kingston to ashes, and its inhabitants to "ruin; that though he still continued to rav-"age and burn all before him, on both sides of the river; these instances of unexampled "cruelty, but established the glorious act of in-

CHAP. XI.

"dependence, on the broad basis of the general refentment of the people." He added, "and is it thus, sir, your king's generals think to make converts to the royal cause? It is no less surprising than true, the measures they adopt to serve their master, have the quite contrary effect. Abler generals, and much more experienced officers than you can present tend to be, are by the fortune of war now in my hands. This fortune may one day be your's; when it may not be in the power of any thing human, to save you from the just resentment of an injured people."*

After this letter, general Gates flayed only to make the necessary arrangements, and immediately moved on to the relief of the sufferers in that quarter. On the approach of the renowned conqueror of Burgoyne, the marauding parties under general Vaughan, Wallace, and governor Tryon, all retired to New York, there to give an account to administration, of their barbarous exploits against the defenceless villages.

General Clinton with three thousand troops, in conjunction with commodore Hotham, had entered the Hudson in the beginning of October. At a great expense of men on both sides, ^{*} General Gates's letter, published in the British Remembrancer.

The posts on the Hudson were defended by officers of dexterity and skill. Governor Clinton of New York, a gentleman diftinguished for his patriotifm, military talents, and unshaken firmness in the cause of his country, commanded the forts Clinton and Montgomery. General Putnam, an experienced and meritorious officer, was stationed lower down the river. But though the works were ftrong, and defended with courage and ability, by the American officers, they were overpowered by the number of the enemy, and obliged to retreat with precipitation. After the storming of the forts Clinton and Montgomery, many of the foldiers, and fome officers were made prifoners. The retreat of those who escaped, was effected with difficulty: governor Clinton himfelf had time only to escape by crossing the river in a boat.

The count Grabouski, a Polish nobleman, a volunteer in the British army, fell in the storm of the forts, as did major Sill, and several other officers of much military merit. General Clinton had laid waste the borders, dismantled the forts, burnt most of the houses, and spread terror and devastation on both sides of the Hudson. General Vaughan was left to finish the business. In one of his letters transmitted to England by lord vifcount Howe, he boafts that "he had not left one house, in the flou"rishing and industrious town of Esopus;" and offers no other reason for reducing it to ashes, but that "the inhabitants had the temer"ity to fire from their houses, on his advance" to rob them of liberty, property, and life. This is a mode of making war, that the politeness and civilization of modern Europe has generally agreed to criminate, though still practised by many inhuman conquerors: but it was revived and adopted in the American system, with all the ferocity that stimulated the ancient barbarians, to sink in conslagration the Italian cities.

These instances of severity were not singular: the same mad fury was exercised in almost every place, where the strength and power of Britain obtained the advantage. This became the source of perpetual jealousies, and destroyed all considence between Britons and Americans, even in the faith of treaties. Thus, some intimations from general Burgoyne while at Cambridge, that the terms of convention were not fully complied with on the part of America, and some equivocal conduct with regard to the embarkation of the troops, raised a suspicion, that the British officers intended to evade their engagement, and transport the captured army to New York, instead of

This was grounded on a propofal, that the convention troops should march to Newport, and there embark. This occasioned a resolve of congress, "that the troops should remain in "their quarters at Cambridge, until an explicit "ratification of the convention of Saratoga, "fhould be properly notified to congress by the "court of Great Britain." This was heavily complained of by general Burgoyne and his officers, who faid that this step was finking the dignity, and a breach of faith in that respected body. Political cafuiftry frequently palliates the deviations from rectitude in public bodies. Sound policy might justify the measure, but it is yet doubtful whether there was fufficient reason to believe, that Burgoyne meant to break his engagements, and throw his troops into New York, to be immediately again employed against the United States.

New causes arose to enhance the difficulties of their exchange, or their return to their native country. Thus this idle and dissipated army lay too long in the neighbourhood of Boston, for the advantage of either side. While there in durance, they disseminated their manners; they corrupted the students of Harvard college, and the youth of the capital and its environs, who were allured to enter into their gambling parties, and other scenes of licentious. nefs. They became acquainted with the defigns, the refources, and the weaknesses of America; and there were many among them, whose talents and capacity rendered them capable of making the most mischievous use of their knowledge. After long altercations between general Phillips and general Heath, who commanded in that quarter, relative to the diforders that took place among the foldiery of both parties, and mutual charges of breaches of the articles of convention, congress directed that the British troops should march to Charlotteville in Virginia. They accordingly left Cambridge November the tenth, one thousand feven hundred and feventy-eight.

General Burgoyne had early requested leave to repair to England on parole, pleading the broken state of his health, the deranged situation of his private affairs, and the hazard of character, if not present to defend himself on the tidings of his defeat. He was permitted by congress to depart, and arrived in England in May, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight. But he met a very ungracious reception both from the people, the ministry, and his king. Notwithstanding his abilities to serve, and his sidelity to his master, he was refused an audience by majesty, a court of inquiry, or a court-martial, and for some time a hearing in the house of commons.

He had left England in the fanguine expec- CHAP. XI. tation of carrying conquest before him, wherever he appeared, of fubduing the Americans, and restoring tranquillity to the revolted colonies; he had returned on parole by the favor of that authority he had ever despised, and left his army in the hands of his enemies. The debates in parliament on the occasion, were warm and interesting. Some law-officers of the crown infifted, that as a prisoner, he was bound by his first engagements: they said, to talk of a trial without the power to punish, was a farce. It was urged, "that as a prisoner, "he was not capable of acting in his perfonal "capacity; and that under his present obliga-"tions, he was totally incapacitated for the ex-" ercife of any civil office, incompetent to any "civil function, and incapable of bearing arms " in his country."*

Thus was the haughty Burgoyne affronted and mortified, after long and faithful fervices to his king and country. He was ordered immediately to repair to America as a prisoner, according to his engagements; but as the ill state of his health prevented his compliance, he was perfecuted until he refigned all his employments under the crown.

^{*} Parliamentary debates.

After some time had elapsed, general Burgoyne was permitted the opportunity of speaking for himself in the house of commons, where he defended his own reputation and cause with ability and spirit. In the course of his argument, he cast many severe censures on the miniftry; and did not fcruple to pronounce them totally incapable of supporting the weight of public affairs, in the present dangerous and critical emergency, into which they had brought the nation. Nor was he without many powerful advocates, who both ridiculed and reprobated the feverity with which he was treated. Strong intimations had been fuggested, both within and without doors, that it might be thought expedient, that the general should be facrificed, to fave the reputation of the minifter. Several expressions of his previous to his capture, intimated his own apprehensions. In a letter to the fecretary of state he said, "my " confidence is still placed in the justice of the "king and his council, to support the general "they had thought proper to appoint, to as "arduous an undertaking, and under as posi-"tive directions, as a cabinet ever figned." In the fame letter, he gave his opinion of the number and discipline of the American troops, and the many difficulties he had to encounter, without the liberty of acting at difcretion.

General Burgoyne observed himself, with regard to American bravery, when speaking of the action of the nineteenth of September, "few actions have been characterized by more " obstinacy in attack or defence. The British " bayonet was repeatedly tried ineffectually. "Eleven hundred British soldiers, soiled in "thefe trials, bore inceffant fire from a fuccef-" fion of fresh troops, in superior numbers, for above four hours; and after a loss of above a "third of their numbers, (and in one of the " regiments above two-thirds,) forced the ene-"my at last. Of a detachment of a captain " and forty-eight artillery-men, the captain and "thirty-fix men were killed or wounded. "These facts are marked by a concurrence of "evidence, that no man can dispute. The "tribute of praise due to such troops, will not "be wanting in this generous nation; and it " will certainly be accompanied with a just por-" tion of shame to those who have dared to de-" preciate or fully valor fo conspicuous; who "have their ears open only to the prejudice of "American cowardice, and having been always "loud upon that courtly topic, stifle the glory " of their countrymen, to maintain a base con-"fiftency." He also adds, with regard to the action of the seventh of October, "if there can be " any persons, who, after considering the circum-"flances of this day, continue to doubt, that "the Americans possess the quality and faculty " of fighting, (call it by whatever name they

"please,) they are of a prejudice that it would be very absurd longer to contend with." But no hazard or fatigue, bravery or missortune, was thought a sufficient apology for the loss of his army.

The northern expedition had been a favorite object with the British administration. They were fanguine enough to fuppose, and the nation was led to believe, that fuccess in that quarter would reduce the turbulent spirits of Americans fo low, as to prevent further energy of opposition, and bring the whole country to a due fense of subordination, and unconditional fubmission to the authority of parliament. The low ebb of American affairs at the fouthward, previous to the fuccess of general Gates, gave fome reafonable grounds for fuch an expectation. It is not strange that a disappointment in this favorite object, which was calculated, if fuccessful, to redound much to the glory of the British arms, should be equally mortifying to the pride of the ministry, and the highfpirited people of England, or that it threw the parliament and the nation into a ferment, that did not easily subside. Many gentlemen of distinguished talents, did honor to the feelings of the heart, and the fagacity of their understanding, while it was a fubject of parliamentary debate, by their humane, fensible, and judicious speeches, interspersed with pointed wit, and brilliancy, of fentiment.

The conquest and capture of general Bur- CHAP. XI. goyne, and the British army under his command, was undoubtedly the most fortunate circumstance for the United States, that had yet taken place. It was the most capital and eventful military transaction, from the commencement to the close of the American war. The termination of this expedition, opened new views to the philosopher, the politician, and the hero, both at home and abroad. It diffeminated a spirit, and produced effects throughout America, which had been neither anticipated or calculated, until her fons paraded in the style of the conqueror, before the humiliated bands of veteran British and German prisoners.

So many thousands of brave men and distinguished officers, led captive through the wilderness, the plains, and the cities of the United States, was a spectacle never before beheld by the inhabitants; and the impression it made on their minds, was in proportion to the novelty of the scene, and the magnitude of its consequences. It was viewed as a prelude to events of the highest moment, both to the arms and to the future negociations of the United States. British battalions were no longer deemed invulnerable, even by the most timid and uninformed fons of America. That formidable power which had foread difmay through the colonies, they now beheld as the object of curiofity, and her armies were viewed more in the light of compassion than of terror.

Nor were the troops of the United States longer confidered as a mere undisciplined rabble, either by the parliament or the people of England. Their armies began to appear formidable; and conciliation was preffed from very respectable characters. From the moment of their recent victory, the United States were beheld in a still more honorable light by the other European powers. Most of them had yet stood undecided and wavering: none of them feemed determined on which fide to declare, or whether to look coolly on, as uninterested spectators, until Great Britain had fufficiently chaftifed her rebellious children. It is true fome loans of money had been obtained from France previous to this period, and the fale of prizes had been permitted in the Gallic ports; but this appeared to be more in consequence of the benevolence and the enthusiasm of the people, than the refult of any governmental fystem to aid America effectually, in her struggle for freedom and independence.

The confequences of the brilliant fuccess of general Gates, the influence of this event on the opinion of foreign nations, its operation on the councils of Britain, its effects on the policy of feveral European courts, and its important confequences throughout America, will be re-

But it is proper before we conclude the prefent chapter, to detail a few other circumstances relative to general Burgoyne. After fome time had elapfed, and the agitation of parties fo far cooled, as to permit him the public defence of his character, he gave an affecting epitome of his feelings, his difficulties and embarraffments, in the northern expedition. He obferved, "the remembrance of what I perfonally "underwent cannot eafily be suppressed: and "I am fure I shall not outgo the indulgence of "the candid, if in delineating fituations fo af-"fecting, I add feelings to justification. The " defence of military conduct is an interesting "point of professional honor; but to vindicate "the heart, is a duty to God and to fociety at "large."

"Few conjunctures in the campaign I have "been describing, few perhaps upon military "record, can be found fo diftinguished by exi-"gencies, or productive of fuch critical and anxious calls upon public character and private "affection, as that which now took place."

"In the first place, the position of the army "was untenable; and yet an immediate retreat " was impossible, not only from the fatigue of "the troops, but from the necessity of deliver-"ing fresh ammunition and provisions."

"The losses in the action were uncommonly fevere. Sir Francis Clarke, my aid-de-camp, had originally recommended himself to my attention, by his talents and diligence. As fervice and intimacy opened his character more, he became endeared to me by every quality that can create esteem. I lost in him an useful assistant, an amiable companion, an attached friend: the state was deprived by his death, of one of the fairest promises of an able general."

"The fate of colonel Ackland, taken pri-"foner, and then fupposed to be mortally "wounded, was a second source of anxiety, "General Frazier was expiring."

"In the course of the action, a shot had passifed through my hat, and another had torn my waistcoat. I should be forry to be thought at any time, insensible to the protecting hand of Providence: but I ever more particularly considered, (and I hope not superstitiously,) a foldier's hair-breadth escapes as incentives to duty, a marked renewal of the trust of being, for the due purposes of a public station; and under that reflection, to lose our fortitude by giving way to our affections, to be diverted by any possible self-emotion, from eneeting a present exigency with our best fac- ehar. XL "ulties, were at once dishonor and impiety."*

Perhaps no general officer ever experienced a greater variety of untoward circumstances, than general Burgoyne before the convention, and the furrender of his army to the victorious Americans. It requires a lively imagination, to comprehend a full view of the difficulty of marching an army, composed of heterogeneous materials, from Quebec to Saratoga, to traverse a forlorn wilderness, pathless thickets and fwamps, extensive sheets of water, and navigable lakes defended by a refolute enemy, covered by ftrong works, that coft the wafte of many of his troops to overcome.

It is true his German allies were brave, and the usual valor of British troops needs no encomium; but the Canadians and the loyalifts could not be depended upon, and the hordes of favages that joined his train, were more the objects of terror than affiftance, even to the mafters under whom they had enlifted. They pillaged, plundered, threatened, and occasionally murdered their friends, and when the cause grew desperate, retreated in tribes to take thelter in their distant forests.

CHAP. XI.

Of the loyalists, general Burgoyne thus obferves:- "Many of them had taken refuge in "Canada the preceding winter, and others had "joined us as we advanced. The various in-"terests which influenced their actions, render-"ed all arrangement of them impracticable. "One man's views went to the profit he was "to enjoy when his corps should be complete; another, to the protection of the district in "which he refided; a third was wholly in-"tent upon revenge against his personal enese mies; and all of them were repugnant even to an idea of subordination. Hence, the set-"tlement who should act as a private man, and "who as an officer, or in whose corps either "fhould be, was feldom fatisfactorily made " among themselves; and as furely as it failed, "fucceeded a reference to the commander in chief, which could not be put by, or delega-"ted to another hand, without diffatisfaction; "increase of confusion, and generally a loss of "fuch fervices as they were really fit for; viz. "fearching for cattle, afcertaining the practica-66 bility of routes, clearing roads, and guiding "detachments or columns upon the march." He farther observed, that "the interests and "the passions of the revolted Americans, con-"center in the cause of the congress, and those " of the loyalists break and subdivide into va-"rious pursuits, with which the cause of the "king has little or nothing to do."

From these and other circumstances above CHAP, XI, detailed, even prejudice itself ought to allow a due share of praise to general Burgoyne, for maintaining his refolution and perfeverance fo long, rather than to wound his character by cenfure, either as a foldier, a man of honor and humanity, or a faithful fervant to his king.

But talents, valor, or virtue, are feldom a fecurity against the vindictive spirit of party, or the refentment that refults from the failure of favorite political projects. Thus, though the military abilities of general Burgoyne had been conspicuous, and his services acknowledged by his country, yet from the mortification of the monarch, the court, and the people of England, on the difgrace of their arms at Saratoga, he was not only fuffered, but obliged to retire.

Though the marked refentment of adminiftration was long kept up againft this unfortunate officer, he did not spend all the remainder of his days in private and literary purfuits. is true he never again acted in a military capacity; but time relieved the present oppression, when he again took his feat in parliament, and with manly eloquence, not only defended the rights and liberties of his native ifle, against the arbitrary fystems in vogue, but afferted the juftice and propriety of American opposition.

This he did with becoming dignity, and an impartiality which he never might have felt, but from the failure of his northern expedition. The reputation the American arms acquired by this defeat, not only humbled the proud tone of many British officers besides general Burgoyne, but did much to hasten the alliance with France, and brought forward events that accelerated the independence of America.

CHAPTER XII.

Observations on the Conduct of the British Parliament, previous to the Capture of Burgoyne.—The ineffectual Efforts of the Commissioners sent to America, in consequence of Lord North's Conciliatory Bill—Their Attempts to corrupt Individuals and Public Bodies.—Negociation broken off.—Manifesto published by the Commissioners—Counter Declaration by Congress.—Sir William Howe repairs to England.

WHILE America gloried in her recent fucceffes against the northern army, and was making all possible preparations for vigorous action at the fouthward, the coercive system in Britain was so far from being relaxed, that the most severe measures were urged with bitterness and acrimony. The speeches of the king were in the same tone of despotism as formerly: the addresses of parliament were in the usual style of compliment and applause; as if they had little else to do, but to keep each other in good humor, until alienation was complete, and the colonies so far connected with other powers, that there could be no hope of reconciliation.

But though a unifon of fentiment, and a perfect conformity to the royal will, previous to CHAP. XII.

the news of Burgoyne's defeat, appeared in the majority of both houses of parliament, yet the measures of the ministry were, as usual, warmly opposed by fome gentlemen of the first abilities in the nation. Several of the principal nobility were in the minority, and urged an accommodation before America fhould be irretrievably loft. It was recommended to the minister, "rather to forge bands of amity for the minds, "than chains for the bodies of Americans." The prefent moment of uncertainty with regard to fuccefs, was urged as the proper feafon for giving the most unequivocal proofs of cordiality, by requesting his majesty to order a ceffation of hostilities, and the immediate adoption of measures for accommodation.*

Mr. Fox, whose powers of oratory were the admiration of the world, not only reasoned against their measures, but ridiculed the ministry in the most pointed manner, for their ignorance of America from the outset of the controversy. He alleged, "that they had mista-"ken the extent of the thirteen colonies, and "considered the Massachusetts as including the "whole." Nor were they less mistaken in the weight of opposition they had to encounter. He observed, "they had ever been blind to the "consequences of their own measures, or they

"and loyal petitions; more especially that pre-"fented by Mr. Penn, late governor of Penn-"fylvania, even after the battles of Lexington and Bunker hill."* He expatiated on the abfurdity and injustice of the bill for transporting Americans to England for trial, the Quebec act, the restraining bill, the declaratory act, and the Boston port bill.

All papers relative to America for three years past, were ordered to be laid before the house; and the state of the army, and the expenditures in the course of the war, loudly called for. But amidst the severe fcrutiny of the house, the anxiety of the nation, the perfeverance of the king, and the perplexity of the minister, all parties were thunderstruck by the arrival of the intelligence of Burgoyne's defeat, and the capture of the army at Saratoga.

A general gloom overfpread every countenance: the severest censures were cast on the late measures of administration; indignation burnt in the bosoms of those who opposed them: clamor raged without doors; asperity, farcasm, and reproach, from the lip of truth? within: and, notwithstanding his abilities and his firmness, the minister was distressed, the minority increased, and opposition was strength-ened.

Lord Chatham rose with his usual energy, eloquence, and commanding spirit, and reprobated both the war and the mode of profecuting it; and with vehemence and acrimony afferted, "that a court fystem of wickedness "had been adopted for the last fifteen years, "fubversive of all faith and confidence, tending "to extinguish all principle in the different or-"ders of the community; and that an afcen-"dency had been obtained by worthless men, "the dregs of party, where no influence ought "to exist. That a spirit of delusion had gone "forth, the people had been deceived by min-"ifters, and parliament had fanctioned the de-"ception. False lights had been held out to "the country gentlemen, imposed on by the "ideal project of an American revenue; but "that the visionary phantom, conjured up for "the basest purposes of deception, was about " to vanish."

The minister,* though attacked, mortified, and embarrassed, retreated with ability and address from ground to ground, through the debates, and endeavoured to shift the blame from himself, and cast the failure of the system, and the odium of disappointment, on the want of capacity in the officers employed. He mani- CHAP. XIL fested his regret for the unhappy differences between the two countries, in passionate expresfions, and urged, that the conciliatory plan he had proposed some time before, might be immediately adopted; and that commissioners fhould be fent to America, with powers to restore tranquillity, without further delay. He acknowledged that he began to despair of reducing the colonies by arms, unless a difunion could be effected, and the intervention of foreign powers in their behalf, decidedly prevented.

But the people in feveral counties were fo infatuated by the popular theme of an American revenue, that fubscriptions were opened in London, Briftol, and other places, for raifing and supporting a body of troops at private expense, to supply the deficiencies in the army by the convention of Saratoga. The legality of this measure was contested in both houses of parliament; and a refolve was proposed by the earl of Abingdon, "that granting monies for "private uses, and without the fanction of par-"liament, was against both the letter and the "fpirit of the conftitution: that obtaining "money by fubscription, and applying it to his "majesty's use, in such manner as he should

"think fit, was unconstitutional, and a direct

"infringement of the principles of the British " constitution." But the measure was not dis-countenanced by authority, and the fubscriptions went on.

If not first suggested by them, these subscriptions were encouraged by fome of the most affluent of the American refugees, who had repaired to England on the retreat of general Howe from Boston. This appearance of settled rancor against their native country increased the refentment of their countrymen; and in consequence thereof, some of their estates, which had been only fequestered, were confifcated and fold, and the monies arifing therefrom deposited in the public treasury. But many of this class of people, who laid their real or pretended fufferings before administration, were afterwards amply provided for by the liberality of the British government, though not adequate to their own expectations.

All Europe had beheld with aftonishment and applause, the exertions and the struggles of the American colonies, against the opulence, the arms, and the intrigues of Britain. It was now three years that they had with uncommon resolution, and systematical decision, supported their armaments by sea and land, without a single ally.

The American congress had indeed, as early as the beginning of the autumn, one thousand feven hundred and seventy-six, appointed commercial agents to feveral European courts, empowering them to procure arms, ammunition, and clothing, on the credit of the United States. They were received politely by the nation, though not publicly countenanced by the court of France, on their first arrival. Yet their negociations had been favorable to trade, and to the condemnation of a vast number of prizes, that had been taken by the Americans and sent into the several ports of France.

CHAP. XII.

Doctor Franklin was foon after empowered to act as an American plenipotentiary there, and arrived in France, December, one thousand feven hundred and feventy-fix. The celebrity of his character, and the popularity of his miffion, infured him the warmest reception from all ranks; and the minister* gave him private encouragement to hope for all necessary aid, and a full completion of the wishes of his constituents. The Spanish ambassador likewise, at this time requested copies of his instructions, and a sketch of the state of America, which he forwarded to his catholic majesty, as the two courts were determined to act in perfect unifon, although no national compact was completed between France and America, until ear-

It required time to ripen a meafure in a defpotic court, to support a struggle like the prefent; a struggle unparalleled in modern nations. An effort for the liberties of mankind, by colonial opposition to the parent state, the proud and potent fovereignty of Britain, might rationally be expected to have an influence on the political fystems of the greatest part of Europe. Besides, the intrigues of the British cabinet, and the policy of France, might co-operate to postpone the event of any foreign alliance with the colonies, until American firmness had been tried in the ordeal of affliction, and her conftancy and fuccess had rendered her more respectable in the eyes of older nations, and long practifed statesmen.

But the conquest and capture of a British army, commanded by officers of distinguished name and abilities, was considered as a decided proof of the importance of the connexion, and hastened the determination of France to conclude a treaty, that might cut off all hope of reconciliation between the colonies and the mother country. Thus on the sixth of February, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, a treaty of alliance, amity, and com- CHAP. XIL merce, was figned by the minister on the part of France, and by Benjamin Franklin, Arthur Lee, and Silas Deane, esquires, on the part of the United States of America. Doctor Franklin was immediately introduced to his most christian majesty, as the minister plenipotentiary for the American states: and on the May following, the Sieur Gerard arrived on the continent, in quality of ambassador, and was introduced in form to the American congress.

This mortifying event had for some time been predicted by the minority in the British parliament; yet the minister affected to disbelieve even the probability of its taking place; and as late as March the eleventh, one thoufand feven hundred and feventy-eight, defired, "that it might be remembered he declared in "his place, that he knew of no fuch treaty, "either in existence or contemplation." Only eight days after this, the duc de Noailles, in the name of his fovereign, announced the treaty in form; and a rescript thereof was delivered to the king of Great Britain.

The ignorance or incapacity of the minister, in not obtaining more early intelligence of the conduct of the house of Bourbon, or his wickedness in concealing the information if he had received it, was echoed from the house to the city, and from the city through the nation.

But there was little reason to doubt, notwithstanding the solemn declaration of the minister, that he had obtained more authentic documents than he was willing to acknowledge, of the transactions of the French cabinet. This was undoubtedly the reason, why the conciliatory bills were hurried through both houses, and sent over to lord and general Howe, before the act was completed, or commissioners named for the purpose.

Many diffinguished members in both houses of parliament infifted, that an immediate fufpenfion of hostilities, and a direct acknowledgment of the independence of America, was the only medium of fafety. They justly observed, that the burning fome of their fairest towns, defolating their lands, plundering their houses, and abusing their wives and daughters, had left fuch an acrimonious stamp on the minds of Americans, as destroyed all faith and confidence in the appearances of accommodation, or advances towards reconciliation. Others still fanguine in profecution of measures less derogatory to the pride of Britain, urged a change of ministry, and a new arrangement of officers, in both the civil and military departments. At the fame time they urged, that commissioners should be appointed to repair to America, to confer with congress as a legal body, or with the state legislatures in their present form; and that they should be authorised to offer a ceffation of hostilities, a repeal of all obnoxious CHAP. XIL bills, a free trade, a reprefentation in parliament, and in fhort, almost every thing they could wish, except an explicit acknowledgment of independence.

This mode was adopted, and commissioners appointed to make overtures from the parent ftate, that would once have been received with the highest tokens of gratitude. But that period was irretrievably paffed. Probably had administration taken a cool retrospect of the natural operations of the human mind, and reflected on the infult and mortification, of the repeated rejection of fincere and ardent petitions; of the commencement of hostilities by staining the fword with the blood of innocence; of the miseries that awaited the unhappy victims, which the uncertain chances of war had thrown into their hands; and the numberless instances of deception, that had been practifed on the less experienced politicians of America,—they must themselves have been senfible, that all ideas of peace, on any conditions, but the most decided acknowledgment of the independence of the United States, were precluded.

But men impelled by a partiality for fystems of their own fabricating, whether they originated in passion, plausibility, or interest, can seldom bend their pride to a generous dereliction снар. XII. 1778. of their favorite object, though reason or time might have brought to their view a full conviction of its absurdity or impracticability.

Great Britain was at this time herfelf without allies; nor had fhe any reason to expect the affistance of foreigners, to facilitate the subjugation of America, except the auxiliaries she had obtained at an immense expense, from fome of the petty princes of Germany. They had fome time before applied to the states of Holland, to fend forward a Scotch brigade in their fervice, in aid of their hostile operations against the colonies; but by the fingle voice of one of their honest republicans, it was prevented, and the propofal rejected in a ftyle characteristic of his nation. He observed, that "it " was more proper for Britain to hire janiza-" ries for their purpose, than to apply to the " Batavians, who had fo dearly purchased their " own liberties."*

Thus, while a war with France was apprehended to be the immediate and inevitable confequence of the weak, pernicious, and perverfe councils of the British cabinet, the opposition declared the nation had every thing to fear from the house of Bourbon, and nothing to hope from the affistance of other European powers. These circumstances generally known, occasioned the most painful feelings to those who were actuated by the principles of justice or humanity; nor were the minds of fuch as were influenced only by the rancor of party, much more tranquil. But the loss of the colonies, the independence of America, her connexion with France their hereditary foe, could not yet be digested by the king, the ministry, or the nation; and the conciliatory propofals were voted to be carried forward on other principles than those of humanity or equity. The army and navy establishments were augmented; and the proud display of war, power, and conquest, was again to accompany the foft voice of peace and re-union.

The gentlemen appointed to undertake the arduous work of conciliation with the American states, after the inhumanity and irritation of a three years war, were the earl of Carlisle, fir William Eden, governor Johnstone, and fir Henry Clinton. Qualified for negociation, and determined if possible to re-unite the revolted colonies with Great Britain, they left England with these slattering expectations, and arrived in the Delaware the latter part of May, amidst every preparation on both sides, for opening a vigorous campaign.

During their residence in America, they faithfully executed their trust; and by every exertion, both in their joint and feparate capacity, they endeavoured to fulfil the expectation of their fovereign: yet from the reception which congress had recently given to a previous intimation of their designs, the commissioners could have no very fanguine hopes of fuccess.

General Howe had, as early as April the twenty-first, sent a slag to general Washington, informing him of his own expectations: at the same time, he transmitted him a copy of the conciliatory bill. These the general immediately forwarded to congress, who appointed a committee to consider the proposition. It did not take much time to deliberate, before the committee reported a number of reasons, why the proposals of the British court appeared to them fallacious; and that it was "their opin" ion, that the United States could with no "propriety, hold any conference or treaty with "commissioners on the part of Britain, unless, as a preliminary, they withdrew their sleets and armies, and in positive and express "terms, acknowledged the independence of the "United States."

This fpirited language, before any account of the completion of any treaty with France had arrived in America, discovered a due dependence on their own magnanimity and firmness: and by the dignity of their resolutions, congress manifested a consciousness of the justice of their cause, and a reliance on that providential support, they had hitherto remarkably experienced.

Perhaps at no time fince hostilities had commenced, between Great Britain and the colonies, could the United States have been found less disposed to negociate on the terms now offered by the British government, than at the present.

When the commissioners arrived, they found the news of an alliance with France, and a treaty of amity and commerce with that nation, had reached York-Town, where congress was sitting, the second day of May, a very short time after they had rejected the proposals sent on by lord Howe.*

All America was apprifed of the divisions in the British parliament, and happy in their own unanimity. An ambassador had been appointed to repair to America, and her independence was acknowledged by one of the first courts in Europe. The brilliant successes of the last year, and the promising appearances on the opening the campaign of the present, all co-operated to lead the congress and the state legislatures, to continue the high tone of sensibility and dignity, becoming a free and independent people, just emancipated from foreign domination. The commander in chief, the officers of the army, the soldiers in the sield, and indeed every description of people, selt a new degree of enthusiasm, enkindled from the sanguine expectation of all necessary aid, in consequence of an alliance with France, which was now completed to their wishes.

The commissioners on their arrival lost no time: they immediately opened their correspondencies, both public and private. The secretary to this commission was the celebrated doctor Ferguson, a gentleman well known in the literary world, by his elegant historical and philosophical writings. Yet the respect for his character and abilities, which would have insured his welcome, on any occasion unconnected with political considerations, could not influence congress to grant him passports, as requested by the commissioners, only to deliver in person the credentials for opening a treaty. In consequence of this resusal, the king's commission, and a letter from the commissioners, were both sent on by the usual military posts.

The letter contained fome flattering advan- CHAP. XHI ces towards America, and many complimentary expressions to individuals; but it was without the smallest appearance of any recognition of the independence of the United States. Many reproachful strictures on the infidious policy of France, were interwoven in the letter: this rendered their address still more exceptionable in the eye of congress; and their overtures were generally difgufting to the people at large.

In the prefent crisis, it was not thought either polite or politic by any one, to interlard the propofals for an accommodation with America, with indelicate reflections on the new allies of the United States, almost at the moment when congress had received the most indubitable proofs of the friendship of the house of Bourbon; and when every bosom glowed with hope and expectation, of the highest advantages from an alliance just fealed by each party, and ratified by congress, to the mutual fatisfaction of both nations.

Yet allowances ought ever to be made for hereditary or national prejudices, as well as for private difgusts. In both cases the foreness of the human mind feels the keenest sensibility, when old wounds are probed by a hand prepared to strike a mortal blow, the first favorable opportunity. Thus the commissioners and the CHAP. XII.

British nation, beheld with indignation and bitterness, the arm of France their hated rival, stretched out to rescue their colonies, now the United States, from the despotic views of the king and parliament of England.

When congress had given the proposals for peace, offered under the fanction of royal authority, a fair and candid discussion, a reply was concisely drawn up and signed by the honorable Henry Laurens, president of the continental congress. It was observed in this answer to the proposals, that "both the late acts "of parliament, and a commission empowering "a number of gentlemen to negociate, and the "letter received by congress from those gen-"tlemen, all went upon the same mistaken "ground, on the supposition that the people of "America were the subjects of the crown of Britain."

"That fuch ideas were by no means admif"fible. Yet notwithstanding the injustice of "the claim on which the war originated, and
"the favage manner of conducting it, congress "was inclined to peace, whenever the king of "England should manifest a sincere disposition "therefor, by an explicit acknowledgment of "the independence of America, and by with"drawing his sleets and armies: that they will "then enter into a treaty of commerce, not in"consistent with treaties already existing."

They also referred the commissioners to their resolves and determinations of the twenty-third of April, a short time before the arrival of the treaty of alliance with France. CHAP. XII.

This drew out a fecond letter from the commissioners, draughted with much art, ability, and address. In this they observed, that "they "were not disposed to dispute about words: "that a degree of independence was admitted "in their letter of the tenth of June: that the "people of America had the privilege of dispo-"fing of their own property, and to govern "themselves without any reference to Britain, "beyond what is necessary to preserve a union "of force, in which mutual fafety confifts." They added, "that danger from their heredi-"tary enemy, and gratitude to those who had "hazarded much for their affection to Britain, "must for a time prevent his majesty from "withdrawing his fleets and armies; but that "they were willing to enter on a discussion of "circumstances, that might be necessary to se-"cure and enlarge their independence: and "that they wished for a full communication of "the powers, by which congress was authori-"fed to treat with foreign nations."

They intimated that there had been no resolutions of the particular assemblies, conferring this power. Thus an effort was made in the beginning of negociation, to disfuse jealousies, and divide the people. In fhort, the fophistry that marked their public declarations, and the infidious proposals made to corrupt private perfons, were very unbecoming the negociators for peace, and inconsistent both with the probity of individual character, and the dignity of their master.

It does not appear, that the conduct of any of these gentlemen singly, was equally reprehensible with that of governor Johnstone. By private letters to some of the members of congress,* he endeavoured to warp their integrity with the flattering promises of distinguished offices and emoluments, in proportion to their risk in promoting the present views of administration. He was bold enough to say, "Wash-"ington and the president would have a right "to every thing a grateful nation could bestow, "if they would be instrumental, once more in "uniting the interests of Great Britain and "America."

His advances to Mr. Reed, an influential member of congress, were still more openly affrontive, by offering him a direct bribe, and na-

He might perhaps think it fome extenuation of the affront offered to Mr. Reed, that he had formerly fallen under some suspicions from his countrymen.

He had been early and zealous in opposition to Britain; had repaired to Cambridge as aidde-camp to general Washington; was afterwards appointed adjutant general; and continued in habits of intimacy and confidence with the commander in chief, until the retreat through the Jersies, and the gloomy and defperate situation of American affairs, towards the close of the winter of one thousand feven hundred and feventy-fix. pects to his country, more from timidity than difaffection, he was on the point of relinquishing the public cause. It was afferted he absolutely applied to count Donop at Burlington, for a protection for himself and family, on condition of his forsaking his country, in the lowest stage of her distress, and his general and friend, at a period when he most needed his affistance.

But the brilliant action at Trenton, and the fubsequent successes at Princeton, and other places in the beginning of the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, restored the tone of his nerves so far, as to enable him to act with distinguished sirmness, sidelity, and bravery, on many trying occasions; and disposed almost every one to throw a veil over the momentary weakness of a mind, generally well disposed to his country.*

* Mr. Reed had publickly announced his regret that a letter written by him to general Lee, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, had been published to the world. He observed, that "that letter was written in haste, and written in a moment of great anxiety; "not from any diminution of affection for general Wash-"ington," whom he justly styles, "a great and good man."

This letter was undoubtedly the result of Mr. Reed's apprehensions, at a period when there was the utmost

These circumstances were known in the British army, and probably induced governor Johnstone to think Mr. Reed a proper subject for his designs. He proposed as an adequate reward for his treachery, if Mr. Reed would engage his interest to promote the object of their commission, that he should have any office in the colonies in the gift of his Britannic majesty, and the sum of ten thousand pounds sterling in hand. This extraordinary proposal was made through a lady, who had some connexions in the British army. Finding she expected an explicit reply, and being a lady of so much respectability as to demand it, Mr. Reed answered, that "he was not worth the purchating, but such as he was, the king of Great my could once be brought to listen to propofals, or to barter his fidelity, no one could make a better bargain for Britain than Mr. Morris, who had so much the ear and considence of general Washington.

From some circumstances in Mr. Dana's former conduct, Mr. Johnstone might think himself fure of his influence, without bidding very high; and though liberal of his master's gold, it does not appear that he offered him a direct bribe. Mr. Johnstone's considence in the success of his attempt on the sidelity of this gentleman, was probably grounded on a circumstance generally known. Mr. Dana had formerly fallen under the suspicions of many of his countrymen, that he was not friendly to their opposition of British measures.

This fuspicion arose from his having repaired to England a short time before the commencement of the war: but within a year after the battle of Lexington, he had eradicated those prejudices by returning to his native country, entrusted with some secret communications from the friends of America then in England. This recommended him to favor and reconciliation with his countrymen: they laid aside their suspicions; and some characters of known integrity brought him forward, and soon after he was chosen a member of the general congress.

The above traits of character might be thought proper materials for a British commissioner to operate upon, but governor Johnstone was mistaken in the character of Americans: for, notwithstanding their passions, their foibles, or their weaknesses, there were few at that time, who would not have spurned at the idea of being purchased. They highly resented the effort to tamper with their integrity at any price, when the liberty of America was the stake.

CHAP. XII.

These letters and transactions were immediately laid before congress by the several gentlemen, who thought themselves particularly infulted, by fuch unequivocal attempts on their honor and fidelity. This demeanor of one of the commissioners, was refented in a manner that might be expected from that respectable body. The American congress at this period, was, with few exceptions, composed of men jealous of their rights, proud of their patriotifm and independence, and tenacious of their honor and probity. They resolved, that as they felt, so they ought to demonstrate the most pointed indignation, against such daring attempts to corrupt their integrity. They added, that "it was incompatible with their honor, to "hold any further intercourse with George "Johnstone, Esq., more especially to negociate

"with him, on affairs in which the cause of liberty was interested."*

This resolve announced in all the public papers, drew out a very angry declaration from Mr. Johnstone. He intimated, that he should decline acting in future as a commissioner, or in any other way negociating with congress. He observed, that "the business would be left in " abler hands; and that he should be happy to "find no other impediment in the way of ac-"commodation, after he was removed; but "that he was inclined to believe, the refolu-"tions of congress were dictated on similar mo-"tives to the convention of Saratoga." Mr. Johnstone alluded to a resolve of congress in reply to the offer of the commissioners, to ratify the convention of Saratoga. To this offer they had replied, "that no ratification that "may be tendered, in confequence of powers "that only reached the case by construction, " or which may fubject all transactions relative "thereto, either to the future approbation or "disapprobation of parliament, can be accepted "by congress."

^{*} For Mr. Johnstone's private letter to the president of congress, and Mr. Laurens' reply, which was equally honorable to himself and to his country, and which breathed that spirit of dignity, independence, and virtue, which uniformly marked the character of this gentleman, the reader is referred to the journals of congress.

To the refentful language of governor Johnftone, he added, that congress acted a delusory part, contrary to the wishes of their constituents: and after many very severe reslections on their connexion with France, he avowed a total disregard either of the good or ill opinion of such a body; but acknowledged, "that making a just allowance for men acting under the heats of civil convulsions, he had a regard for some individuals that composed it."

Doubtless, at the moment of this passionate declaration, Mr. Johnstone had forgotten the slattering epithets, even to adulation, that he had recently bestowed on the same body he now affected to hold in sovereign contempt. But congress persevered in their usual steady line of conduct, and took no farther notice of the letters, declarations, or addresses of the commissioners.

Thus closed their public negociations, yet they did not despair of dividing the colonies. Letters and addresses were still circulated to the governors of particular states, and to private gentlemen, and inflammatory declarations were spread throughout America. The poison of these new modes of overture for peace, between contending nations, was effectually antidoted by the spirited publications of several gentlemen of ability, in their private capacity.*

^{*} W. H. Drayton, and others.

The last effort made by these disappointed negociators, before they left America, was the publication of a manifesto signed by three of them, and dispersed throughout the continent. This address appeared to be dictated more by refentment and despair, than expectation or hope. It contained an endeayour to foment jealousies between the several states; and infinuated that congress were not authorized by their constituents, to reject the offers of Britain, or to enter into alliances with foreign nations. Propofals were made for feparate treaties, either with the governors, the legislative bodies, or individual gentlemen; and offers of pardon were held out to any in civil or military departments, and to all descriptions of men, who should, within forty days, defert the fervice of their country, and enlift under the Standard of Britain.

This was not the most offensive part of this extraordinary manifesto. Vindictive threatenings were denounced against all, who should continue deaf to these gracious and generous calls of their sovereign. It sinished by declaring, that if America still preferred her connexion with the insidious and hereditary enemy of Britain, she must expect the operations of war

Mankind are feldom driven into compliance, by the haughty threats of powerful adversaries, unless they feel their own weakness to fuch a degree as to render them abject. But America, confcious of her own internal strength, and sure of the assistance of foreign allies, rather fpurned at the virulent spirit of this declaration. It did not increase their refpect towards the negociators for peace. Nor were the Americans alone offended at the style and manner of this address: it was considered as deficient both in policy and humanity, even by fome officers in the British army. One of them, of high rank, immediately repaired to England, and declared with honest indignation in the house of commons, of which he was a member, that "he could not bear the attempt " to convert foldiers into butchers, affaffins, and "incendiaries; or the abominable idea of " fheathing his fword in the bowels of age and "innocence. Nor would he be instrumental "in tarnishing the lustre of the British name. "by acts of barbarity, in obedience to the man-

But by the activity of officers of less delicacy and tenderness, the theory of cruelty held out by the commissioners, was soon realized by the perpetration of every crime: and the extreme rigor of war, which in modern times has been meliorated by the general consent of civilized nations, was renewed in America, in all the barbarous shapes that the ingenuity, or the wickedness of man could invent.

Soon after the manifesto of the commissions ers was published, a declaration was issued by congress, though not in terms equally cruel and threatening. They however discovered their resentment by the severity of their language; and a fort of license was encouraged for retaliation on individuals, if the British proceeded to murder the inhabitants, and burn the houses of private persons. They thought themselves justistiable in this from past sufferings, and the present threatenings of officers commissioned to reconcile, instead of further irritating the injured Americans.

Congress reproached them with meanness, in attempting to carry their point by bribery, corruption, and deceit; and charged their nation with making "a mock at humanity, by the CHAP XII. They appealed to the Searcher of Hearts for the rectitude of their intentions, and observed, that not instigated by anger or revenge, they fhould, through every poffible change of fortune, adhere to their determinations.

In this state and temper of the congress, the people, and the commissioners, fir Henry Clinton took the command of all the royal troops in America. Previous to the opening of the fummer campaign, fir William Howe had obtained leave to repair to England. His intended absence was much regretted by the British army, and as a man of pleafure and address, by the gay part of the city of Philadelphia. Every manifestation of respect was expressed on the occasion, and the most superb display of modern luxury exhibited in an elegant entertainment, which drew attention from the novelty of the style. The mischianza was considered a new species of pleasure; but the appellation was only an additional decoration to an effort defigned to pay the highest compliment and respect, both to the military and the private character of general Howe.

Notwithstanding this and other testimonials of the affection of his officers and his army, he was censured by the ministry on his arrival in England, and a public clamor prevailed against his general conduct, during his command in America. In consequence of the ill temper excited against him, he published a long narrative in his own desence, and urged a free examination of his conduct in the house of commons.

But the minister appeared averse to strictures that might lay open too many of the fecrets of the cabinet. However, feveral diftinguished gentlemen of the army were at last called to examination, and on the whole gave a favorable testimony to the military character and operations of general Howe, and extenuated the failure of particular manœuvres, by the difficulty and embarrafiment of his fituation, in a country where it was impossible for him to know, whether he was furrounded by friends or foes, and where he often found himfelf deceived by the mifrepresentations of the loyalists. In order to invalidate the evidence of lord Cornwallis and other respectable characters, the party against fir William Howe procured the examination and evidence of Joseph Galloway, and forme others of the most inveterate refugees, CHAP. XII. who had fled from America, and were difappointed that the subjugation of their country was thus long delayed.

Much censure fell on the ministry for their reforting to the testimony of American refugees, penfioners, and cuftom-house officers, whose places, pensions, and existence, depended on their adherence to ministerial measures, to invalidate the evidence of military men of high rank and great professional knowledge.

Sir William Howe was not again vefted with command during the American war. Some other officers, either difgusted or difcouraged, returned to England after the fummer campaign. Several of them were advanced and fent out again in the fucceeding fpring, to purfue the work of flaughter, or to humble the haughty spirit of Americans at the feet of monarchy. A number of these illfated officers, whose merits were conspicuous in their line, did not again return to the bofom of their native country, the beloved island of Britain; where their furviving friends were left to weep at the recollection of the ashes of the brave, scattered over the heights and plains of the American world.

THE new commission with which fir Henry Clinton was now vested, was prompt, arduous, and replete with consequences of the highest magnitude to his country, and to his own reputation. The Trident man of war had arrived in the Delaware early in the month of June, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight. In this ship came the British commissioners for conciliation; and through the hand of sir William Eden, general Clinton received peremptory orders to evacuate the city of Philadelphia, within six days after their reception. Accordingly the whole British army decamped, and began their march toward New York on the eighteenth of June.

The fudden defertion of a city that had been fo much the object of their warmest wifhes, tended at once to dishearten the adherents to the royal cause, and to invigorate the operations of their antagonists. It could not be expected, that general Washington would remain a quiet spectator of this movement of the British troops. He immediately dispatched a reconnoitering party under general Maxwell, to harass their march.* The marquis de la Fayette also marched at the head of a detachment, to meet them and impede their progress; and general Lee with two brigades, was ordered to follow and support him.

The British commander prepared for this interruption, suddenly attacked and routed the cavalry under the marquis. By this the infantry were deranged: and general Washington, finding an action of moment was likely to enfue, posted himself, after several military movements, as advantageously as possible, near the heights of Monmouth.

The Americans spirited and courageous, the British resolute, brave, and desperate, a sharp

* Before general Washington moved, he called a council of officers to consult on the expediency of attacking the British on their march. They were almost unanimously opposed to the measure, as the failure of success would be ruin to the American army. But the American commander, with two or three of his best officers, had no reluctance at hazarding the consequences of a general action.

CHAP. XIII. conflict fucceeded. The military game of death and retreat, of recovery and flaughter, was kept up for feveral hours without decision. But a mifunderstanding on a disobedience of orders by general Lee, occasioned such a derangement on the American fide, as gave the opportunity for a fafe retreat to the royal army, in fpite of the valor and intrepidity of their opponents. Many on both fides fell by the intense heat of the weather. It was one of those days not unufual in the fouthern clime, when the stroke of the fun is instantaneously fatal to human life, without the agitation and fatigue inseparable from the hour of battle.

> Some warm expressions in the heat of engagement from general Washington, drew feveral letters from Lee, that could not be paffed over in filence. For these, and for his deportment through the events of the day of action, he was fuspended from his command, and afterwards tried by a court-martial. The exigencies of affairs, as well as his mifconduct, made it necessary, that he should lie under cenfure for disobedience, and disrespect to the commander in chief:* yet many of his brother officers advocated, or at least extenuated his conduct.

Perhaps it might not have been either treach- CHAP. XIM. ery, cowardice, envy, or any other unworthy motive, that influenced the conduct of general Lee. He had but recently recovered his liberty after he was captured at Hackinfack. Previous to that time, the American army was too justly considered by him, an undisciplined rabble. They had indeed, in his absence, made great improvements in the art of war, and the necessary arrangements of military discipline; however, he had not yet a proper confidence in the infant troops he commanded, when opposed to the fuperiority of British battalions, actuated by necessity in addition to constitutional bravery. He might retreat more from the cautious prudence of an experienced officer, than from any defign to betray, or difobey the orders of the commander in chief: but it is certain he did not on all occasions, discover a due respect, either for the character or talents of general Washington.

General Lee was never again employed in American fervice; and undoubtedly died a martyr to chagrin, disappointment, and perfonal abuse, in consequence of the ingratitude of fome of his former friends, arifing from the popularity of a more favored, fortunate, and meritorious officer.

After his trial and fuspension, general Lee retired to a little farm in Baltimore, where he lived in the most coarse and rustic manner. Totally secluded from all society, he conversed only with a few favorite authors and his dogs, until the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two; when weary of his sequestered situation, he lest his retreat, and repaired to Philadelphia. But out of command, he sound himself without friends, without respect, and so far from that independence congenial to his mind, and to his years, that he was almost without the means of subsistence. In a short time, he sickened and died in obscurity, though in a city where he had been used to receive the highest marks of applause and respect.

After the battle of Monmouth, both parties boafted their advantages, as is usual after an indecifive action. It is certain, Washington and his brave troops gained only honor and applause,* whilst fir Henry Clinton must have thought himself fortunate indeed; on the one

^{*} Even the British themselves acknowledged, that the Americans behaved with great spirit and intrepidity. In this action, a corps commanded by colonel Dearborn, acquitted themselves with such undaunted bravery, that they attracted particular notice. A southern officer of rank rode up to Mr. Dearborn, and inquired "who they "were, and to what portion of America that regiment belonged?" The colonel replied in this laconic and soldierly manner:—"Full-blooded Yankees, by G-d, sir, "from the state of New Hampshire."

The defign of the French admiral was to shut up the British army in Philadelphia; but from the inclemency of the weather, and contrary winds, a long passage prevented his arriving seasonably to effect so desirable an object. When sir Henry Clinton lest Philadelphia, he could scarcely expect, or entertain a hope, that he could conduct his army in safety, through such an extent of country, to their destination at New York; but after surmounting many embarrassements, he arrived there with his troops, nearly at the same time when the French squadron appeared at the entrance of the Delaware.

It was a happy circumstance for Clinton, that the count de Estaing did not at first direct his course to New York: however, within a few days after the arrival of the British troops, he appeared unexpectedly off Sandy Hook; and to the inexpressible mortification of British pride, they found themselves blocked up in their own harbor, by the hereditary enemy of their nation. Old antipathies revived; irritatation and resentment were wrought up to the highest pitch, by new provocations; and nothing could exceed the indignation raised by the idea, that the king of France was sending out his sleets and armies, to aid and support the rebellious colonies.

From the fituation of the two fleets before New York, an engagement was thought by all to be inevitable. A fpirit was diffused through all ranks of the royal army and navy, expressive of the vigor, valor, and activity of British soldiers and seamen. Such was the popularity of lord Howe, the importance of the cause, and their resentment towards France, that the soldiers, scarce recovered from their wounds and fatigue, in the late action and retreat, were solicitous and impatient to face their Gallic enemy; and the British seamen in private service were equally emulous, and solicited eagerly, and even contested the honor of employment in the navy.

Prepared for action, and confident of fuccess, they oftentatiously boasted, that the name of Howe, and the terror of the British slag, must intimidate Frenchmen in the moment of danger; as the recollection of former defeats would officiously obtrude, in spite of their most brilliant designs. This opinion was in some measure sanctioned by the inactivity of the count de Estaing, who, after lying eleven days without the smallest advance to action, left his

It is difficult to fay, whether the joy or the furprife of his enemies preponderated on this occasion. They justly considered it a very fortunate circumstance, as within two or three days, five ships of the line belonging to admiral Byron's fquadron, arrived fingly in fo fhattered a condition, that probably they, with the remainder of the fleet, must without a blow, have fallen into the hands of the French, had they continued before New York.

This unexpected manœuvre of the count, was in consequence of a preconcerted plan, that all naval operations should be suspended at the fouthward, and that with all possible difpatch, the French fleet should repair to Rhode Island. This was in order to favor an expedition for the recovery of that beautiful fpot, which had been feized October, one thousand feven hundred and feventy-fix, and held by the British troops, now commanded by fir Robert Pigot. There, under cover of a number of frigates, they had rested in fafety nearly two years. Detachments from the army at Newport and its environs, had frequently made incursions to the main, burnt a part of the town of Briftol, and greatly annoyed both Providence and all the adjacent country.

The count de Estaing arrived before Newport the ninth of August; and within a few days, a large body of militia from the neighbouring states, commanded by general Hancock, and a detachment of continental troops under the command of general Sullivan, landed on the island.

The American troops, healthy, active, and vigorous, flushed with the hope of victory, not only from their own spirit and bravery, but from expectations derived from the presence of their new allies, with a powerful naval force to aid their operations, were sanguine, consident, and impatient for action. But to their unspeakable disappointment, the very day on which they landed, the French fleet again put to sea, their commander having received intelligence that lord Howe had left Sandy Hook, in full force to engage him, and to prevent the dislodgement of the royal troops, who were strong and well fortisted in every part of the island.

Count de Estaing judged it prudent to meet and fight the British squadron at sea, rather than suffer lord Howe to make an effort to gain the harbor. His force was superior, his officers equally brave; there was a mutual ardor for engagement in the seamen, and a mutual ambition for glory, in both the British and French commanders. But the unforeseen operations of nature, that so often impede the designs of CHAR XIII. man, again defeated the proud expectations of triumph in both parties. A fevere ftorm that raged forty-eight hours, feparated the two fleets; and fuch was the violence of a gale fcarcely paralleled in those seas, that lord Howe in a very flattered and broken condition, was obliged to repair to New York to refit; and the French commanders thought themselves happy to reach Boston, in a very wretched and difabled state. The admiral's own ship was difmasted: the Cæsar of seventy-four guns, commanded by monfieur de Booves, met the Ifis, a British ship of war of only fifty guns; a sharp conflict enfued; but the Cæfar having loft all her masts in the storm, darkness approaching, most of his men being slain, and his own right arm shot off, monsieur de Booves found it neceffary to fheer off for Boston, where the whole fleet arrived in a few days.

The count was opposed in the measure of leaving the harbor of Newport, by all the American, and many of the French officers, but by none more strenuously than the brave marquis de la Fayette, who followed him to Boston with the utmost celerity, to endeavour to expedite his return.* This misfortune damped the ardor of the militia, some of whom had, more from oftentation than bravery, voluntarily engaged in this expedition. Near three thousand men relinquished their posts, and left the island in a day. Many of them were influenced to this precipitate desertion, by the conduct of major general Hancock, who, in spite of the remonstrances of friends, and forgetful of the hazard of popularity, left all in the moment of danger, and repaired to Boston.

General Sullivan, not disheartened by these unexpected events, nor discouraged by the untoward accidents that hitherto attended his operations, kept his station fourteen days after the fecession of fo large a part of his forces. Nor did he fuffer his troops to be idle: feveral skirmishes took place, that kept up apprehension on the one fide, and a military ardor on the other; but none of more importance than an action on the morning of the twenty-ninth, when a cannonade began early on both fides, and continued fome hours with doubtful fuccefs. A detachment of the British troops under colonel Campbell, was routed and fled in confusion, leaving many dead on the field, among whom a favorite nephew of the commander was killed by his fide. After this, the command of the count de Estaing. It not being practicable to return to Rhode Island, he in a few weeks after, failed in complete order for the West Indies.

Sullivan and his officers, judging it not prudent CHAP. XIII. to attack a fuperior force entrenched within their lines, withdrew to their own camp, while the British employed the ensuing night in strengthening and fortifying theirs.

Within three days after this rencounter, an express arrived from general Washington with information, that lord Howe had again failed from New York, and that fir Henry Clinton had himself embarked with four thousand men, for the relief of Rhode Island. On the same day the marquis de la Fayette returned from Boston, and reported it impossible for the count de Estaing to arrive there again, timely for any operations of confequence: and as nothing effectual could be done without the aid of naval force, general Sullivan thought proper to withdraw his troops from the island.

His retreat was conducted with fuch fecrecy, filence, and dexterity, as discovered the judgment and ability of the experienced commander. He had in his council fome officers of diftinguished name, who fully justified his conduct through the whole of this unfuccessful expedition. Greene, la Fayette, and Laurens,*

^{*} The noble, difinterelled fentiments of this gentleman, who was then aid-de-camp to general Washington, were exhibited in his reply to congress, who for his distinguished bravery in this and other actions, had advanced him to the rank of lieutenant colonel. Mr. Laurens' acceptance would have superseded some officers in the family of the commander, earlier in commission. Apprehensive that it might create some uneasiness among them, he declined the honor. He observed, "that having been a spectator "of the convulsions occasioned in the army by disputes of "rank, he held the tranquillity of it too dear, to be instru-"mental in disturbing it." Admiral Byron was hourly expected to join CHAP. XIII. him. Thus, fo fuperior in ftrength, there was every reason to expect Boston would be the next object of attack. In confequence of this appearance, the count de Estaing, who found it would require time to victual, water, and equip his fhattered fleet for a fecond cruife, judged it necessary to fortify feveral advantageous islands in the harbor, and thus be in readiness for the reception of the British fleets, if they should be again disposed to visit Boston.

Fleury, Wade, Glover, Knox, Livingston, and Talbot, with many other excellent officers, had the mortification to quit the field, without the laurels so fair a prospect of military glory had waved in view.

This disappointment occasioned some temporary murmurings against the conduct of de Estaing, and even the connexion with France. A squabble soon after the sleet arrived at Boston, between some French and American failors, heightened the uneasiness. But the most respectable people, disposed to view with a favorable eye, and to place the utmost considence in their untried allies, all censure was hushed; and a discreet silence in the more prudent, prevented or counteracted all invidious observations from the less candid.

Lord Howe arrived in the harbor of Newport, with an hundred fail of ships of war and transports, the morning after Sullivan's retreat.

Lord Howe before he returned to New York. went round and looked into the harbor of Bofton; but finding most of the ships belonging to the French fleet repaired, and Castle William and the islands in a defensible state, he did not think proper to make any hostile attempt on the town. Not perfectly pleafed with the American war, and difgusted at some things relative to his own command, his lordthip refigned his commission soon after this, and repaired to England. He left the American feas in September, one thousand seven hundred and feventy-eight.

When his lordship arrived in England, he complained publicly, that he had been deceived into the command, and deceived while in it. Tired and difgusted with the service, he had CHAP. XIII.

been compelled to refign; and that he had fuffered too much ever to rifk a return to any fituation, that might terminate in equal mortification. He observed, that he must be excused from any employment, while the present ministry continued in office, being convinced by decisive experience, that he not only risked his own honor and professional character in the attempt, but that under such councils, he was as fensible as those who had been earlier in opposition, that no essential service could be rendered his country.

But though we fee him no more on the American theatre, yet, notwithstanding his disfatisfaction with the conduct of administration, lord Howe again, before the conclusion of peace, acted a conspicuous part under the renowned stag of Great Britain.

The celebrated Bougainville, who had before explored the other fide of the globe, was, with many other officers of high rank and diftinction, for the first time in the American seas. They were every where welcomed as the generous friends of the United States, the patrons of liberty, and the supporters of the rights of men. But, as there had not yet been time to prove the sincerity of either party, the old officers who remembered the late war between England and France, when America hugged herself in the protection of Britain, and adopted all her opinions, looked as if they wished CHAP. XIII. rather than believed, all ancient prejudices obliterated.* They feemed filently to half doubt the reality of that friendship which appeared in the politeness of their reception, from a people of a different religion, language, habits, and manners; and at first, seemed reluctantly to hold back that flow of affection, which the Americans were ready to return in full meafure.

As to the younger class, unconscious of injury, ambitious for glory, and eager for the humiliation of Britain, hope danced in their eye; every feature displayed the wish of mutual confidence; and with honest joy, they extended their arms to embrace their new allies. Yet, the squadrons of the house of Bourbon riding in the ports, and fortifying the American harbors against their natural friends, the parent of the once loyal and affectionate colonies, was an event which, though precipitated by the folly of Britain, had out-run the expectations of America: nor could fuch a circumstance fail to excite the most serious recollections and contemplations, both of the philosopher and the politician.

The timely and judicious movement of general Sullivan, disappointed the expectations of fir Henry Clinton, who flattered himself he should arrive soon enough to cut off the retreat of the American army. When he sound they had withdrawn, he immediately left the neighbourhood of Rhode Island, and returned to New York, after he had dispatched major general Grey at the head of a large detachment, on a marauding expedition against some defence-less towns in the Massachusetts.

The first attack was on Bedford, a small town on the river Acushnet. He landed in the evening. The inhabitants alarmed at this unexpected attack, most of them sled, and lest their property a prey to their enemies. When they returned in the morning, they found the Britons retired; but to their inexpressible mortification, almost every thing of value was destroyed or carried off. Houses, warehouses, magazines, and stores, with near an hundred fail of shipping, were burnt on the Bedford and Fairhaven sides of the river.

After this feat, Grey proceeded to Martha's Vineyard, laid the inhabitants under contribution, and demanded a furrender of their arms. From thence he visited Nantucket and the neighbouring isles: and with the plunder of CHAP. XIII fifteen or twenty thousand cattle and sheep, for the use of the army at New York, he returned with his party, exulting in depredations that would have been difgraceful to an officer of much inferior character and abilitities.*

Sir Henry Clinton pleafed with the fuccess of this expedition, fent Grey immediately on to aid a fimilar mode of war on the Jerfey coast. Lord Cornwallis had with a large body of troops, taken post between the North River and the Hackinfack: general Knyphaufen with another division, was posted in a parallel position on the other fide of the North River. Thus were they conveniently fituated to guard their foraging parties, and diffress the country by fudden depredations and continual havoc, during the remainder of the autumn.

General Grey with his usual activity had gained intelligence of the infecure fituation, in which a regiment commanded by colonel Baylor, had reposed themselves for the night of the twenty-fourth of September. A party fent on with orders to give no quarter, cut off the guards, and furprifed the unhappy victims afleep in an out-house. They awoke, submitted, implored quarter, and were massacred in an hour. Only ten or twelve escaped with life, after they were barbaroufly wounded, ftripped, and left for dead. This remnant fo far recovered as, by favor of the darkness, to reach the post of their friends, and detail the horrid transaction. They agreed on oath, that they and their companions had all furrendere'd, as foon as they found themselves in the enemy's hands. and asked only for life. But the savage cry was, "kill them, kill them; we have orders "to give no quarter:" and the barbarous echo was kept up till every man was, or appeared to be murdered.*

A repetition of the fame cruel policy foon after took place on the furprise of a party of Pulaski's light infantry. Some deserters had betrayed them into the hands of the British. Several hundred of these unhappy men were butchered without mercy, after the surrender of their arms. The baron de Bose, a Polish nobleman, was among the slain. An apology was afterwards attempted, by pleading that they had received information, that count Pulaski in orders to his legion, had enjoined that no quarter should be given to any that might fall into their hands. This was denied both by the count and his officers. But had it been true, that a foreign nobleman, hardened amidst the barbarities of Polish confederacies, could so far deviate from the laws of humanity as to give such an order, the example should never have been followed by the polite and gallant Englishmen. But in this war, they seemed to have lost those generous feelings of compassion to the vanquished soe, that must ever be deemed honorary to the human character.

A counterpart to the conduct of the more refined, though little more humanized commanders of the predatory parties in the middle and northern colonies, was exhibited in the fouthern borders, by their favage allies of the wildernefs.

This was dreadfully realized by the inhabitants of Wyoming, a young fettlement on the eastern branch of the Sufquehannah. The population of this once happy spot had been remarkably rapid, and when the fury of civil discord first appeared among them, it contained eight townships of five miles square each. They were situated in a mild climate, in a country fertile, and beautifully displaying a picturesque appearance of that kind of primitive simplicity, only enjoyed before the mind of man is contaminated by ambition or gold. But party rage had fpread its baneful influence to the remotest corners of America, and political animolities had at this period poisoned the peace, even of the most distant villages, where simplicity, friendship, and industry had reigned, until the fell siend which prompts to civil war, made its frightful appearance, attended by all the horrors imagination can paint.

The inhabitants of this favored fpot, perhaps more zealous than difcreet, had fo far participated the feelings of all America, as voluntarily to raife and fend forward one thoufand men, to join the continental army. This ftep disclosed the embers of opposition that had hitherto lain concealed, in the bosons of a number long difaffected to the American, and warmly attached to the royal cause. A rancorous spirit immediately burst from the latent fpark, which divided families, and feparated the tenderest connexions. Animosities foon arose to such a height, that some of the most active members of this flourishing and happy fociety, abandoned their plantations, forfook their friends, joined and inftigated the neighbouring favages to moleft the fettlements, and affifted in the perpetration of the most unheard of cruelties.

Several outrages had been committed by finall parties, and many threatening appearances had so far alarmed the inhabitants, that most CHAP. XIM. of them had repaired to some fortresses early erected for their defence against the native savages. Yet there was no apprehension of a general maffacre and extermination, till the beginning of July, one thousand seven hundred and feventy-eight, when an army of near two thoufand men, made its appearance on the Susquehannah, and landed on their borders. This body was composed of the motley materials of Indians, tories, half-blooded Englishmen, and British renegadoes, headed by one Butler, who had nothing human about him, except a rough, external figure of a man.

All the inhabitants of those weak, defenceless settlements capable of bearing arms, embodied, and put themselves under the direction of a person of the same name, a near relation of the commander of the favages. This man, either through fear, weakness, or misplaced confidence, liftened to the offers of treaty from his more artful kinfman, and fuffered himfelf with four hundred men, to be drawn from fort Kingston by a delusive flag, that alternately advanced and retired, as if apprehensive of danger. Caught by the fnare, he was completely furrounded before he had any fuspicion of deception, and his whole party cut off, notwithftanding they fought with a spirit becoming their desperate situation.

The victor immediately pushed on, invested the garrison thus indiscreetly left, and demanded a surrender. The demand was accompanied by the horrid display of a great number of scalps, just torn from the heads, and yet warm with the blood, of their nearest friends and relations. In this situation of wretchedness, embittered by impotent resentment, colonel Donnison, on whom the command had devolved, sinding resistance impracticable, went out himself with a slag, to ask the terms of surrender. To this humiliating question, the infamous Butler replied, with all the sang-froid of the savage, and the laconism of an ancient Greek, "the "hatchet."

The unfortunate Donnison returned in despair; yet he bravely defended the fort until most of his men had fallen by his side, when the barbarians without, shut up this and a neighbouring garrison, where a number of women and children had repaired for safety, and setting fire to both, they enjoyed the infernal pleasure of seeing them perish promiscuously, in the slames lighted by their bloody hands.*

^{*} The transactions at Wyoming are recorded above, agreeably to the most authentic accounts at the time.

After this catastrophe, the most shocking devastation was spread through the townships. Whilft fome were employed in burning the houses, setting fire to the corn-fields, and rooting out every trait of improvement, others were cruelly and wantonly imbruing their hands in the blood of their parents, their brothers, and every near connexion, who had unfortunately held different political opinions. But a particular detail of the transactions of favages, stimulated by the agents of more refined and polished nations, with passions whetted by revenge, without principle to check its operation, is too painful to the writer, and too difgraceful to human nature to dwell on. Nor is it less painful to the impartial historian, to relate the barbarous, though by them deemed necessary, vengeance, soon after taken by the Americans.

The conflagration spread over the beautiful country of the Illinois, by a colonel Clark of Virginia, equally awakes compassion, and was a counterbalance for the sufferings of the miserable Wyomings. It is true the Illinois, and other distant warlike tribes, were at the instigation of governor Hamilton,* the British commander at Detroit, generally assisting in the measures perpetrated under Butler and Brandt, nearer the frontiers; and perhaps the law of retaliation may, in fome measure, justify the depredations of Clark.

This intrepid ranger left Virginia in the course of this summer, with a few adventurers hardy as himself, and traversed a country of eleven or twelve hundred miles in extent: and furmounting all the hardships that imagination can paint, through a wilderness inhabited only by strolling hunters from among the savages, and the wild beafts that prowled before them, through hunger, fatigue, and fufferings innumerable, they reached the upper Missisppi. The Indian inhabitants, who had there long enjoyed a happy climate, and the fruits of a fertile foil, under a high degree of cultivation, fearless of danger from their distance from civilized neighbours, were furprifed by Clark and his party; their crops were destroyed; their settlements broken up; their villages burnt, the principal of which was Kafkafkias. This town contained near three hundred houses; and had it not been furprifed at midnight by these defperate invaders, bold, outrageous, and near starving in the wilderness, the natives might successfully have defended their lives and their plantations; but not a man escaped seasonably to alarm the neighbouring tribes.

A British officer, one Rocheblave, who acted as governor, and paymaster for American scalps, was taken and sent to Virginia, with many written proofs of the cruel policy of inciting the fury of favages against the American CHAP. XIII. fettlements. From Quebec, Detroit, Michilimackinac, &c., these orders every where appeared under the fignature of the chief magiftrates, acting in the name of the British king. Some of their principal warriors were made prisoners; the remainder who escaped the fword, had only to fly farther through a trackless wilderness, if possible to procure some new lodgement, beyond the reach of civilized purfuers.

Nor did the Cherokees, the Muskingums, the Mohawks, and many other favage tribes, feel less severely than the Illinois, the resentment of the Americans, for their attachment to the British nation, and their cruelties practifed on the borders of the Atlantic states.

An expedition entrusted to the conduct of general Sullivan, against the Six Nations, who had generally been better disposed towards Americans than most of the favage tribes, was replete with circumstances that must wound the feelings of the compassionate heart; while the lovers of cultivation and improvement among all mankind, will be touched by a retaliation, bordering, to fay the leaft, on favage fury. tion and improvement, when he contemplates fire and fword destroying all in their way, and houses too well built to be the workmanship of men in a state of rude nature, the prey of conflagration, enkindled by the hands of the cultivators of the arts and sciences.*

The rooting up of gardens, orchards, cornfields, and fruit trees, which by their variety and growth, discovered that the industrious hand of cultivation had been long employed to bring them to perfection, cannot be justified; more especially where there is a mind capable of looking forward to their utility, and back to the time and labor it has cost to bring them to maturity. But general Sullivan, according to his own account in his letters to the commander in chief, to congress, to his friends and others, spared no vestige of improvement, and appeared little less proud of this war upon nature, than he was of his conquest of the savages.†

The difficulties, dangers, and fatigues of the march, required courage, firmness, and perfeverance. Hunger and famine affailed them before they reached the fertile borders of the pleafant and well fettled Indian towns; yet CHAP. XIII. general Sullivan and his party finished the expedition in as fhort a time as could be expected, and to all public appearance, met the approbation of congress and of the commander in chief.

Yet there were fome things in the demeanor of general Sullivan, that difgusted some of his officers, and raifed a cenfure on his conduct that made him unhappy, and led him to refign his military command. His health was indeed broken, which he imputed to the fatigues encountered on his hazardous march. Yet he lived many years after this period, and was advanced to the highest stations in the civil administration of the state of New Hampshire, and died with the reputation of a brave and active officer, both in military and civil life.

General Sullivan had acquitted himfelf during his military command with valor and reputation, in many inftances. During the ravages of the British on the Jersey shore, in the latter part of the fummer of one thousand seven hundred and feventy-feven, he had gained much honor by an expedition to Staten Island, concerted . by himfelf. This he undertook without any orders from the commander in chief; and for this a court of inquiry was appointed to examine into his conduct. His reasons for such a step, without permission or command, were thought justifiable. He brought off a great number of prisoners, officers, foldiers, and tories, who had frequently made incursions on the borders of the Jersies, and harassed, plundered, and murdered the inhabitants in their sudden depredations. It appeared that general Sullivan had conducted this business with great prudence and success: he was, by the court of inquiry, acquitted with honor and applause, for planning and executing to great advantage, a design from which so much benefit had resulted.

It may be thought by fome, an apology fufficient for the invafion of Clark and Sullivan, of Pickens, Van Schaick, and others, that the hostile dispositions of the aboriginals had always led them to imbrue their hands in the blood of the borderers. The warriors of the distant tribes, either instigated by their own ferocity and refentment, or the influence of Europeans inimical to the United States, were ever ready to moleft the young fettlements. Jealous of their encroachments, the natives viewed them with fuch an hostile eye, that no treaties were binding: when a favorable opportunity prefented, they always attacked the whites, perhaps from the fame impulse that in human nature prompts all mankind, whether civilized or favage, to refift the invaders of his territory.

Indeed their condition and their fufferings, from the first emigration of the Europeans, their corruptions in consequence thereof, their wars, and their extirpation from a vast tract of CHAP. XIII. the American continent, must excite a solemn pause in the breast of the philosopher, while he furveys the wretchedness of savage life, and fighs over its mifery. Yet he is not relieved when he contemplates the havoc among civilized nations, the changes in fociety, the proftration of principle, and the revolutions permitted by Providence in this speck of creation.

The rivers of blood through which mankind generally wade to empire and greatness, must draw out the tear of compassion; and every fympathetic bosom will commiserate the fufferings of the whole human race, either friends or foes, whether dying by the fword, fickness or remorfe, under the splendid canopy reared by their own guilty hands. These with equal pity look into the wilderness; they see the naked hunter groaning out his fierce foul on his native turf, flain by the tomahawk of his own favage tribe, or wounded by fome neighbouring hordes, that prowl through an existence little elevated above the brute. Both stages of fociety excite compassion, and both intimate to the rational mind, that this is but the road to a more improved, and exalted flate of existence.

But the unhappy race of men hutted throughout the vast wilderness of America, were the original proprietors of the foil; and if they have not civilization they have valor; if they have not patriotism they have a predilection to country, and are tenacious of their hunting grounds. However the generous or humane mind may revolt at the idea, there appears a probability, that they will be hunted from the vast American continent, if not from off the face of the globe, by Europeans of various descriptions, aided by the interested Americans, who all consider valor in an Indian, only as a higher degree of ferocity.

Their strenuous efforts to retain the boundaries assigned them by nature and providence, are viewed with contempt by those descriptions of persons, or rather as a fanction to their own rapacity, and a warrant from heaven to exterminate the hapless race. But "the rivers, the "mountains, the deserts, the savages clad in ar-"mor, with other destroyers of men," as well as the voice of heaven, and their natural boundaries, forbid these encroachments on the naked forester, content with the produce of nature in his own grounds, and the game that plays in his own wild woods, which his ancestors have possessed to retain the immemorial.

The ideas of fome Europeans as well as Americans, that the rude tribes of favages cannot be civilized by the kind and humane endeavours of their neighbours, is abfurd and unfounded. What were once the ancestors of the CHAP. XIII. most refined and polite modern nations, but rude, ignorant favages, inured to all the barbarous customs and habits of present existing tribes? Nature has been equal in its operations, with regard to the whole human species. There is no difference in the moral or intellectual capacity of nations, but what arifes from adventitious circumstances, that give some a more early and rapid improvement in civilization than others. This gradual rise from the rude stages of nature to the highest pitch of re-finement, may be traced by the historian, the philosopher, and the naturalist, sufficiently to obviate all objections against the strongest efforts, to instruct and civilize the swarms of men in the American wilds, whose only natural apparent distinction, is a copper-colored skin. When the present war ceases to rage, it is hoped that humanity will teach Americans of a fairer complexion, to use the most strenuous efforts to instruct them in arts, manufactures, morals, and religion, instead of aiming at their extermination.

It is true at this period, when war was raging through all the United States, few of the tribes of the wilderness appeared to be contented with their own native inheritance. They were every where stimulated by the British government to hostility, and most of the inhabitants of the wilderness seemed to be in array against their former colonies. This created a necessity in congress, to act offensively against the rude and barbarous nations. Defensive war against any nation, whether civilized or savage, is undoubtedly justifiable both in a moral and political view. But attempts to penetrate distant countries, and spread slaughter and bloodshed among innocent and unoffending tribes, too distant to awaken fears, and too simple and unsufficious to expect approaching destruction from those they had never injured, has no warrant from Heaven.

Even in the present war, instances may be adduced of the effects of civilization, which often soften the most savage manners; one of which may be here recorded. A part of the Muskingum tribe had professed themselves Christians of the Moravian sect. They considered war of any kind as inconsistent both with the laws of religion and humanity. They resulted to take any part with the numerous hostile tribes of savages, in the war against the Americans. They observed with more rationality and consideration than is generally discovered in more civilized nations, "that the Great Spirit did not make men to destroy, but to assist and comfort each other."

They perfifted in this placid deameanor, until fome of their favage neighbours were fo enraged, that they forcibly removed them from their former fettlement; and after commit- CHAP. XIII. ting great cruelties, and deftroying a number of them, placed the remainder near the Sandusky. Their removal was in consequence of orders from the British commander at Detroit. They remained for some time in the enjoyment of their own fimple habits; but some suspicions were afterwards infused among the settlers on the Monongahela, that their dispositions were not friendly to the Americans. It is painful to relate, that on this flight pretence, a number of Americans embodied themselves and marched to the Moravian town, where the principal men had repaired by permission, to reap the harvest they had left standing in the fields. The Americans followed them, and barbaroufly murdered the whole of this innocent and inoffensive band.

The whites at first decoyed them by a friendly appearance, which induced them to collect themselves together; when thus collected, they, without relistance, fuffered themselves to be bound and inhumanly butchered. They died professing their full expectation, that their troubles would foon be at an end. Thus they fell as martyrs to religion, by the hands of a people who had much longer professed themfelves adherents to the principles of Christianity.

This inftance of the treachery and cruelty of the whites, is one among many other proofs, of the truth of an observation made by a gentleman* afterwards, "that the white savages "were generally more savage than the copper-"colored; and that nine times out of ten, the "fettlers on the borders were the aggressors: "that he had seen many of the natives who "were prisoners at fort Washington; that they appeared to be possessed of much sensibility and gratitude: that he had discovered some singular instances of this among them, very honorable to the human character, before the advantages or the examples of civilized nations had reached their borders."

In fhort, no arguments are necessary to adduce the truth, or impress on the minds either of the philosopher or the politician, that it will be the indispensable duty of the American government, when quietly established by the restoration of peace, to endeavour to soften and civilize, instead of exterminating the rude nations of the interior. This will undoubtedly be attempted in some future period, when uncultivated reason may be assisted; when arts, agriculture, science, and true religion, may enlighten the dark corners which have been obscured by ignorance and ferocity, for countless ages. The embrowned, dusky wilderness, has exhibited multitudes of men, little distin- CHAP, XIII. guished from the fierce animals they hunted, except in their external form. Yet, in a few instances, the dignity of human nature has been discovered by traits of reason and humanity, which wanted only the advantages of education, to display genius and ability equal to any among the nations, that have hunted millions of those unhappy people out of existence, since the discovery of America by Europeans. But it is a pleafing anticipation, that the American revolution may be a means in the hands of Providence, of diffusing universal knowledge over a quarter of the globe, that for ages had been enveloped in darkness, ignorance, and barbarism.

IT has already been observed, that in an early stage of the American contest, some gentlemen were deputed to negociate, and to endeavour to secure the assistance of several European nations. This had had such an effect, that at the period we are now upon, the United States were in strict alliance with France, and were considered in a partial and respectful light by some of the first powers in Europe. Yet difficulties both at home and abroad, which had scarcely been viewed in theory, were now realized and felt with poignancy, by the true friends of their country.

The objects that employed the abilities of congress at this period, were of such magnitude, as required the experience of ancient states- CHAP. XIV. men, the coolness of long practifed politicians, and the energies of virtue.

The articles of confederation offered to the confideration of each legislative in the feveral states, in one thousand seven hundred and seventy-fix, had been rejected by fome, and fufpended by others. It is true they were now récently ratified by all of them, but were fcarcely yet established on a permanent basis.*

They had to arrange, harmonize, and fupport the new permanent army, collected from every part of the union, and now interwoven with foreign volunteers from different European nations: and in the rear of every other difficulty at home, they had to guard with all possible discretion, against the innumerable moral and political evils, ever the inevitable confequence of a depreciating currency.

Abroad they had a task of equal difficulty, to heal the animolities that existed, and to conciliate the differences that had arisen among the American ministers at the court of France, or to prevent the fatal confequences of their virulence towards each other. This was expressed in strong language in their letters to congress, nor was it a secret in the courts of England or France, and in some instances, perhaps it was somented by both.

In the infancy of congress, in the magnitude of the new scenes that were opening before them, and in the critical emergencies that sprung up on untrodden ground, they, through hurry or inexperience, had not in all instances, selected men of the most impeccable characters, to negociate with foreign powers. Perhaps in some of their appointments, they did not always look so much at the integrity of the heart, as at the capacity of the man for the arts of intrigue, the ready address, and the supple accomplishments necessary for the courtier, both to insure his own reception with princes, and to complete the wishes of his employers, in his negociations with practised statesmen.

Silas Deane, esquire, a delegate to congress from the state of Connecticut, was the sirst perfon who had been vested with a foreign commission. He embarked as a commercial agent in behalf of the United States, in one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six; and was afterwards named in the honorable commission for a treaty of alliance with the court of France, in conjunction with doctor Franklin and Arthur Lee, esquire.

Mr. Deane had nothing to recommend him to CHAP. XIV. fuch a distinguished and important appointment, except a degree of mercantile experience, combined with a certain fecrecy or cunning, that wore the appearance of knowing things much beyond his ability, and the art of impofing a temporary belief of a penetration far beyond his capacity. His weakness and oftentation, his duplicity, extravagance, and total want of principle, were foon discovered by his constituents: but they placed the most unlimited confidence in the great abilities, profound knowledge, and unshaken patriotism, of the venerable and philosophic Franklin. His warm attachment to his native country, had been evinced in numberless instances, during his long residence in England as agent to the British court, both for the Massachusetts and the state of Pennsylvania.

Before he left England in one thousand seven hundred and feventy-five, he had taken unwearied pains to reconcile, on the principles of equity and found policy, the breach between Great Britain and America. In the beginning of hostilities he repaired to Philadelphia, was chosen a member of congress, and by his decided republican principles, foon became a favorite in the councils of America, a stable prop of her independence, and the most able and influential negociator they could fend abroad.

The character and principles of Mr. Arthur Lee, gave equal reason to expect his most energetic endeavours, to support the interest and weal of America. He had refided in England for feveral years, as agent for the state of Virginia. Invariably attached to his native country, and indefatigable in his efforts to ward off the impending evils that threatened it, he had communicated much useful intelligence and advantageous advice, to the patriotic leaders in various parts of America; and by his spirited writings and diligent exertions, he procured them many friends in England. He was a man of a clear understanding, great probity, plain manners, and strong passions. Though he loved America fincerely, he had at this period great respect and affection for the parent state; and his predilection in favor of Britain appeared strongly, when balanced with the idea of an American connexion with the house of Bourbon.

The celebrity of doctor Franklin has been fo just and so extensive, that it is painful even for the impartial historian, who contemplates the superiority of his genius, to record the soibles of the man; but intoxicated by the warm caresses and unbounded applauses of all ranks, among a people where the art of pleasing is fixtematized, he appeared, notwithstanding his age and experience, in a short time after his residence in France, little less a Gallican than an American. This might be from policy. It was faid however, that he attached himself to the interest of the count de Vergennes, who, though he countenanced the American revolution, and co-operated in measures that completed it, yet it was afterwards discovered, that he secretly wished to embarrass their councils, and dreaded the rising glory of the United States. Whatever suggestions there might have been, it was never supposed that doctor Franklin was led off from his attachment to the interest of America; yet this distinguished sage became susceptible of a court influence, that startled his jealous and more frigid colleague, Mr. Lee.

Thus the trio of American agents at the court of France, were defignated by peculiar traits of character: yet the respectability of Dr. Franklin and Mr. Lee was never lessened, either at home or abroad, notwithstanding some variation of opinion. But Mr. Deane, immersed in the pleasures of a voluptuous city, a dupe to the intrigues of deeper politicians, not awed by the aged philosopher the tool of the French minister, and the supple instrument of military characters, ambitious of rising in the fair sield of glory in America, he wasted the property, and bartered away the honors of his country, by promising offices of rank to sifty gentlemen at a time. He sent many of these on to America, with the most flattering expectations of promotion, and even with ideas of superfeding the previous appointments of congress,

Many of the French officers who arrived on the American continent at this early period, with these fallacious hopes, were men of real merit, military experience, and distinguished rank; but it was impossible for congress to provide for them all according to their views, without deranging the whole army, and disgusting many of their best officers. Thus disappointed, some of them returned to France, under a cloud of chagrin that was not easily dissipated.

The indifcretion of Mr. Deane did not terminate with his engagements to individual ftrangers; for while he embarraffed congress and the army with his contracts, and his country by fquandering the public monies, he had the audacity to propose in a letter to a person of influence, that a foreign prince should be invited to the command of the armies of the United States.*

From the outlines of these heterogeneous characters, it is not strange that the most incurable animolities took place among the commiffioners, and arose to such a height as to endanger the interests of an infant republic.

Indeed the fate of America in some measure depended on the vigor, integrity, prudence, and unanimity of her ministers abroad; but diffension ran to such a pitch among them, that it exposed them not only to the censure of their country, but to the derision of Britain. Confequently, an immediate recal of some of the American commissioners became necessary, and an order paffed in congress, December, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, that Silas Deane, efquire, should immediately return to America. No reasons were offered for his recal; and Mr. John Adams of the ftate of Massachusetts, was chosen to succeed as commissioner in behalf of the United States, at the court of France.

Mr. Deane arrived in America a fhort time after the treaty with France had been received, and ratified by congress. He assumed an air of importance and self-considence; and as guilt frequently sends a hue and cry after justice, in order to hoodwink the multitude, and calls loudly for vengeance on such as are about to detect its villany, he offered a most in-slammatory address to the public, complaining of ill usage, and vilifying Mr. Lee in the grossest terms. He criminated every part of his public conduct, charged him with betraying his trust, corresponding with gentlemen in England, impeding as much as possible the alliance with France, and disclosing the secrets of congress to British noblemen. At the same time, he cast the most virulent and insidious reslections on his brother, William Lee, agent for congress at the courts of Vienna and Berlin.

He claimed much merit relative to the treaty of alliance with France, and complained heavily that congress delayed giving him an opportunity of vindicating his own character, by an immediate public investigation. By these bold fuggestions and allegations, so injurious to congress and to their ministers, the public mind was for a time greatly agitated. But the attack on individual character, was defeated by the exertions of fome very able writers,* who laid open the iniquitous defigns and practices of the delinquent and his abettors; while congrefs parried the abufe, they defended their own measures, and quieted the clamors of a party against themselves, by calling Mr. Deane to a hearing on the floor of their house.

With the guise of innocence and the effrontery of guilt, he evaded the scrutiny, by pleading that his papers and vouchers were all left in Europe, where, he alleged, the necessity of his own private affairs required his immediate presence. In short, though it was obvious that he had abused his commission, rioted long at the public expense, and grossly flandered some of its most faithful servants, yet by the influence of certain characters within, and a tenderness for fome without, who might be exposed by too ftrict an investigation, congress were induced to fuffer him again to leave the continent and return to Europe, though not as a public character, yet without punishment or judicial cenfure. He afterwards wandered from court to court, and from city to city, for feveral years: at last, reduced to the extreme of poverty and wretchedness, he died miserably in England.

Parties ran very high in congress, relative to the diffensions among their ministers. Mr. Lee had many friends in that assembly; Dr. Franklin had more; and it was necessary for some mercantile speculators in that body, to endeavour to throw a veil over the character of Mr. Deane, that under its shade, the beams of clearer light might not too deeply penetrate their own.

Mr. Robert Morris, a member of congress. from the state of Pennsylvania, had undoubtedly been concerned in fome very profitable contracts, in company with feveral French and American gentlemen, befides Mr. Deane; and under the fanction of public negociations, the most lucrative trade was carried on, and the fortunes of individuals accumulated beyond calculation.

Monsieur Gerard, the French minister residing in Philadelphia, was warmly attached to Dr. Franklin and Mr. Deane, and not less difgusted with Mr. Lee. It may be observed, that there are few public ministers so tenacious of the dignity of their own character and conduct, as not occasionally to descend to rank among partizans, and exert the influence of public character to gratify private interest or refentment. Thus Mr. Gerard, an idolizer of Dr. Franklin, supported Mr. Deane, offered pensions to take off the defenders of Mr. Lee, and instead of retaining the superiority of an ambaffador from one of the first monarchs in Europe, appeared the champion of a club of merchants and speculators. He resided but a short time in America: the chevalier de la Luzerne fuperfeded him as ambaffador to the United States, in the fummer of one thousand feven hundred and feventy-nine. The reasons of his recal do not appear; but it was undoubtedly a prudent measure in the court of France, not to fuffer a minister to continue, after he had discovered himself attached to a party.

Within a few months after Congress had made a new arrangement of ministers, and Mr. Adams had been sent on in the room of Mr. Deane, both Mr. Adams and Mr. Lee were directed to repair immediately to America; and Dr. Franklin was appointed sole minister at the court of France. Americans, it is true, were early initiated in the spirit of intrigue, but they were not yet so thoroughly acquainted with the manœuvres of courts, as to investigate the necessity of the sudden recal of those gentlemen.

Mr. Lee had been very feverely cenfured by many for his want of address, and his unaccommodating spirit at the French court. Nor had he been more fuccessful in his negociations with Spain. He had refided fome months at Madrid, as commercial agent, with powers if practicable to negociate a treaty, or to obtain a loan of money for the use of the United States. But he was unacceptable to the court; and though he had the abilities of a statesman, he was without the address of a courtier; and his negociations in Spain redounded little to the advantage of America. Yet fuch was his integrity, that he found it not difficult on his arrival in his own country, to reinstate himself fully in the good opinion of the public, and to wipe from his character the afperiions of malice or prejudice.

Mr. Adams returned rather difgusted at the early revocation of his commission, and the unexpected order thus fpeedily to leave the court of France. He did not himself repair to congress, but retired privately to his feat in Braintree, where he employed himself for a time, in preparing a concife statement of the situation and political connexions of the different powers of Europe, which he laid before congress, with his opinion of their interests and their views relative to America, and recommended the pursuance of every step, that might tend to ftrengthen the alliance with France. Nothing can more strongly exhibit the pride Mr. Adams felt in the Gallican alliance, and his zeal for fupporting it, than the expressions contained in his own letters on this fubject, on his first residence at the court of France.

But in Mr. Adams's communications to congress, he advised them strenuously and invariably "to guard against their principles in gov-"ernment, and the manners that were so op-"posite to the constitutions of America, and "the character of a young people, who might hereafter be called to form establishments for a great nation."* Mr. Adams continued in this retired and mortified fituation for some months; but we shall see in its place, he was afterwards called upon to transact affairs of a very high and important nature.

CHAP. XIV.

It was obvious to every one, that from the family interest and connexion between the courts of France and Spain, the latter would undoubtedly co-operate with the views and defigns of the former; but no treaty, alliance, or any public countenance had yet been given to the Americans, by the court of Madrid. Spain had ofcillated between peace and war for feveral years. She had offered herfelf as mediatrix among the contending powers: but infulted on the feas, and her interference rejected by Britain, she appeared in June, one thousand seven hundred and feventy-nine, to act a more decided part. The marquis de Almodovar, the Spanish ambassador in London, delivered a refcript to lord Weymouth about this time, couched in language that amounted to a declaration of war.

On these movements in Europe, congress thought proper again to send an envoy to the court of Spain. John Jay, esquire, a gentleman from the state of New York, was appointed to this mission, September the twenty-seventh, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine. His capacity was equal to the business: he was well received, and his public character acknowledged: yet his negociations were of little consequence to America, while he resided in Spain. Perhaps apprehensive that the spirit of freedom and revolt might extend to her own colonies, Spain chose to withhold her assistance.

No treaty with the United States was effected by Mr. Jay's mission, no concessions with regard to the free navigation of the Missisppi, or any security for trade to the Bay of Honduras, were obtained. On these important points he was directed to negociate, as well as to solicit a loan of money, sufficient to assist the United States in the pursuit of their measures. But no loan of money of any consequence, was to be drawn from the frigid and wary Spaniards. Notwithstanding the necessities of America were fully exposed by her minister, the highest favor he could obtain was, the trivial loan of four or sive thousand pounds.

Spain had no predilection in favor of the independence of the British colonies. She had always governed her own plantations beyond the Atlantic, with a very arbitrary and despotic hand. Their contiguity and intercourse with the North Americans led her to fear, that the spirit of freedom might be contagious, and their own subjects there so far insected, as to render it necessary to keep themselves in referve against future contingencies. This they had done for some time after a war was announced between Great Britain and France; CHAP. XIV. but it was impossible for them to continue longer neutral. France was now involved in war, and decidedly supporting the Americans, and England, in expectation of a union of interests, and a modification of the same line of conduct, in the courts of the feveral branches of the house of Bourbon, had in various inftances discovered a hostile disposition, and flood in a menacing posture, as if both her fword and her flag were ready to meet the conjoined forces of both France and Spain.

His catholic majesty thought it impossible for him longer to delay an explicit declaration of his intentions. He published a long manifesto, giving the reasons for a declaration of He ordered his ambaffador to retire from the court of London, without taking leave, and in a schedule published by order, great moderation was professed. In a paper delivered to lord Weymouth by the marquis de Almodovar, it was observed, that "the "causes of complaint given by the court of "London not having ceased, and that court "fhewing no dispositions to give reparation "for them, the king has refolved, and orders "his ambaffador to declare, that the honor of "his crown, the protection which he owes to " his fubjects, and his own perfonal dignity, do " not permit him to fuffer their infults to con-"tinue, and to neglect any longer the repara-

"tion of those already received; and that in "this view, notwithstanding the pacific dispostrains of his majesty, and even the particular inclination he had always had and expressed, for cultivating the friendship of his Britannic majesty, he finds himself under the disagreeble necessity of making use of all the means which the Almighty has entrusted him with, to obtain that justice which he has solicited by so many ways, without being able to acquire it.

"In confiding on the justice of his cause, his "majesty hopes, that the consequences of this "resolution will not be imputed to him before "God or man; and that other nations will form a suitable idea of this resolution, by comparing it to the conduct which they "themselves have experienced, on the part of the British ministry."

While things stood thus in the courts of Great Britain, France, and Spain, the indecisive movements for a time in the southern states of America, engaged the public attention, and awakened anxious apprehensions for the refult; at the same time that a scene of rapine and plunder was spread through the central parts, Virginia, New York, and Connecticut.

The predatory excursions of this year were begun early in the summer. An expedition to the Chefapeake, under the command of fir CHAP. XIV. George Collier of the navy and general Matthews of the army, ferved no other purpose than to alarm, diftrefs, and impoverish the towns of Portfmouth, Suffolk, and other places in the ftate of Virginia, that fell under their spirit of conflagration. They stayed but a short time there: after enriching themselves with the spoils of the inhabitants, and leaving many of those who had once basked in the lap of affluence, the houseless children of poverty, they left the state, by order of the British comman-

The pleafant line of towns bordering on Long Island Sound, in the state of Connecticut, were the next who felt the fevere confequences of this mode of war, from British troops supported and covered by the fquadron under fir George Collier, who was recalled from the Chefapeake to aid fimilar measures farther north.

About the beginning of July, governor Tryon with a number of difaffected Americans, and general Garth with a ravaging party of British troops and German yaughers, landed at New Haven, took possession of the town with little resistance, plundered and infulted the inhabitants, on whom every cruelty was perpetrated, except burning their houses: this was delayed from their thirst for plunder, and the barbarous abuse of the hapless semales who fell facrifices to their wanton and riotous appetites. Hurried afterwards by their avarice for new scenes of plunder and misery, they left New Haven and repaired to Fairfield, where they landed on the seventh of the month.

This place fuffered a ftill more cruel and fevere fate. Their landing at Fairfield was but feebly opposed: the militia indeed made a faint resistance, but soon retreated, and left their property and in many instances their families, to the mercy of the enemy. This was not altogether from the want of courage, but from a consciousness of their own comparative weakness, and a strange delusive opinion, that the generosity and compassion of the British would be exercised towards them, when they found only a few women, children, and aged men left, who seemed to have thrown themselves on their compassion.

The historian would willingly draw a veil over the wanton outrages committed on the wretched inhabitants left in the town, most of them of the feebler sex. Some of them, the first characters in the place, from a wish to save their property, and an indiscreet considence in the honor of governor Tryon, with whom they had been personally acquainted and who had formerly received many civilities at their houses, risked their own persons and their honor, amidst the fury of a conquering enemy, on a kind of sham protection from a man who had forgotten the obligations of politeness, and the gratitude due to those who had treated him with every mark of genteel hospitality.

The principal ladies of Fairfield, who fromtheir little knowledge of the world, of the ufages of armies, or the general conduct of men, when circumftances combine to render them favage, could not escape the brutality of the foldiery, by shewing their protections from governor Tryon. Their houses were risled, their persons abused, and after the general pillage and burning of every thing valuable in the town, some of these miserable victims of forrow were found half distracted in the swamps and in the fields, whither they had sled in the agonies of despair.

Tryon endeavoured afterwards to exculpate his own character, and made some futile excuses for his conduct. He would have justified himself on the principles of policy, when he felt the indignation expressed against him for his want of humanity; but policy, reason, and virtue, equally revolt at modes of war, that eradicate from the mind not only the moral feelings, but the sense of decency, civility, and politeness.

The avidity of this party was by no means fatiated by the diftreffes of New Haven, and the total deftruction of Fairfield: the neighbouring towns of Norwalk and Greenfield fuffered a fimilar fate: the waste of property in shipping and merchandize, was there more complete. The whole coast equally defenceless and exposed to their ravages, expected to fall in the same way; but, whether from compunction or policy is uncertain, whichever it might be, fir Henry Clinton thought proper to check the career of depredation, so grateful to the feelings of Tryon and his partisans, by a sudden recal within ten days of their landing at New Haven.

Meantime general Washington had kept himfelf in a defensive and respectable situation, in the central parts of America, but without a movement for any very capital stroke, after the derangement of a well concerted plan for an attack on the city of New York. He had expected the aid of the French squadron from the West Indies, to facilitate this judicious measure: the militia of several states had been collected to affift in the defign; the army was in high fpirits; fanguine expectations were formed; and every thing promifed fuccess to the enterprise. But the count de Estaing, perhaps ambitious to fubjugate one of the states to the arms of his mafter, and not dreaming of effectual refiftance to a force, both by land and fea, that might reasonably be thought sufficient CHAP. XIV. for the most capital enterprise, instead of uniting first with general Washington, and covering his attempt on New York by a respectable necessary naval force, he thought proper to hazard the reduction of Georgia on his way, and then repair northward.

But his attack on Savannah, his unexpected repulse and retreat, not only retarded, but totally prevented the decifive stroke contemplated by Washington, nor less apprehended by Clinton, who was thereby induced to order the evacuation of Newport, and draw off all his troops from that quarter. Newport and its environs had been infefted with the inconvenience and mifery of an army and navy on their borders, from the feizure of that place by earl Percy, in one thousand seven hundred and seventy-fix, to their relief in the present year.

The circumstances above related, put it out of the power of general Washington to profecute the feafible fystem he had meditated. The militia were difmiffed, and many of the continental troops returned as usual, at the expiration of their term of enliftment. Clinton had made feveral attempts to draw the American commander from his ftrong and defensible post in the Jersies, as well as to induce him to divide his army, to oppose the defultory invasions and depredations on the defenceless sea-coast. But general Washington very well knew the advantages he might lose by weakening the main body of his army, and was too wise and judicious to be ensured by the manœuvres of the British commander.

The first object of sir George Collier's speedy recal from the ravage of the borders of Virginia, was to co-operate with general Vaughan, in the important movements on the North River. The principal design of this project was, to obtain some important posts on the Hudson. General Vaughan, who had before been distinguished for his feats there, still commanded on the Hudson, but higher up the river. On the arrival of the squadron commanded by sir George Collier, they united, and immediately made themselves masters of Stoney Point on the one side, and Verplank's Neck on the other.

After these places had been dismantled the preceding autumn by fir Henry Clinton, the Americans had in part repaired the works. In each post they behaved with spirit and resolution; but as their numbers were inconsiderable, and their works unfinished, they soon furrendered prisoners of war, on the single condition of humane treatment.

Not many days after this event, general Washington ordered a detachment of his most active troops, under the command of general Wayne, to attempt the recovery of Stoney Point. This bold and vigorous enterprife was conducted in a manner peculiarly honorary both to the officers and foldiers, but not altogether fo confiftent with humanity. They were directed not to load their pieces, but to depend on the bayonet: one who appeared difcontented at the order, was fhot on the occafion. Though this fummary mode of punishment is severe, it was designed to prevent the esfusion of blood: doubtless, had the British been early alarmed by the fire of the American

The works had been repaired and strengthened with great alacrity, and two British regiments, some loyal Americans, and several companies of artillery, left in garrison by general Vaughan. On the evening of the fifth of July, after a difficult and hazardous march, Wayne reached, surprised, and recovered the post, in spite of the valiant opposition within. Colonel Fleury, an amiable, ambitious, and spirited young Frenchman, had the honor and peculiar pleasure of striking the British standard with his own hand. This youthful officer had received the thanks of congress, and the honorary rewards of the soldier, for his distinguished bravery in several previous rencounters.

General Wayne was himself slightly wounded in this enterprise; but the united applauses of the commander in chief, of congress, and of his country, which he received, would have been ample compensation for more painful wounds, or much severer fatigue. The acquisition of this post was more honorary than important: an attempt to have held it would have been fruitless: it had been previously determined in a council of war, that on the success of Wayne, the works should be demolished, and the stores brought off.

Sir Henry Clinton immediately fet his whole army in motion for the relief of Verplanks, which was momently expected to furrender to the American arms, and for the recovery of Stoney Point. He fucceeded to his wifnes; and after only three days possession, this contested spot a third time changed its masters; and the command of the whole river for a time, continued in the hands of the British.

Several other manœuvres took place about this time near New York, and the more central parts of the country, that kept up the spirit of enterprise, and the honor of the arms of the states: but a more consequential affair occupied the public attention, in the eastern extreme of the American territory. A colonel Maclean had been sent with a party of British troops from Halifax, to land at the mouth of the Penobscot, within the jurisdiction of the Massachusetts. He erected a fort, and established a strong post in a convenient situation for harassing the trade, and distressing the young settlements bordering on the province of Nova Scotia. When this intelligence was received at Boston, the hardy and enterprising spirit of the men of Massachusetts did not hesitate to make immediate preparation to dislodge an enemy, whose temerity had led them to encroach on their state.

CHAP. XIV.

It had been only four years fince the commencement of hostilities with Britain. America was then not only without a navy, but without a fingle ship of war. The idea of constructing and equipping a maritime force, was ridiculed by some, and thought chimerical and impracticable by others: but the human mind is generally capable of accomplishing whatever it has resolution to undertake.

By the industry and vigilance of public bodies and private adventurers, they had in this short period acquired a navy, that a century before would have made a respectable sigure among the most warlike nations: and within ten days after Maclean's attempt was known at Boston, the Warren, a handsome new frigate of force, commanded by commodore Saltonstall, and sev1779, enteen other continental, state, and private ships, were equipped, manned, victualled, and ready for sea. They were accompanied by an equal number of transports, with a considerable body of land forces, who embarked in high spirits, and with the fanguine expectation of a short and successful expedition.

This business was principally conducted by the state legislature; nor would the gentlemen of the continental navy board consent to hazard the public ships, unless the commanding officers were positively enjoined to execute their design immediately. They were apprehensive that any delay might give opportunity to send a superior force from New York. From the dilatory conduct of the Americans, after they reached Penobscot, these apprehensions were realized; and before any efficient movements had taken place, fir George Collier with a heavy squadron under his command, appeared for the relief of Maclean.

General Lovell who commanded by land, was a man of little military experience, and never made for enterprise sufficient to dislodge the British from a post of consequence, or in any way complete an undertaking, that required decision, promptitude, and judgment. Commodore Saltonstall proved himself a character of as little enterprise, and in this instance, of less spirit, than the commander of the troops designed to act on shore.

Thus by the shameful delay of both, and to the mortification of many brave officers who accompanied them, the expedition terminated in the difgrace of both army and navy, and the total destruction of the fleet. On the first appearance of fir George Collier, the American shipping moved up the river, with a shew of refistance, but in reality to escape by land, from an enemy they feemed not to have expected, nor had the courage to face. Two of their best ships fell into the hands of the British: the remainder, lighted by their own hands, fuffered a complete conflagration. The panicftruck troops, after leaving their own ships, chagrined at the conduct of Saltonftall, and difgusted with the inactivity, indecision, and indiscretion of Lovell, made their escape through the woods, in small, indiscriminate parties of foldiers and failors. On their way they agreed on nothing, but in railing at their officers, and fuffering the natural ebullitions of difappointment to fpend itself in mutual reproaches. With fatigue, hunger, and difficulty, they reached the fettlements on the Kennebec, and brought the intelligence of their own defeat.

It was not in the power of the infant states to repair their maritime loss during the war; and to complete the ruin of their little navy, fome of their best ships were lost in the defence of Charleston, the year following, as will be seen hereafter. What added to the mortification of this last stroke was, that these ships were prepared and ready to fail, in order to prosecute a very flattering expedition projected by the gentlemen of the navy board, in the eastern department, when they received an express order from congress, to send them to South Carolina.

Scarcely any fingle event during the great contest, caused more triumph to Britain, than this total demolition of the beginning of an American navy. So successful and enterprising had they been, that a gentleman of the first information has observed, that "the privateers "from Boston in one year, would defray more "than one half the expense of that year's "war." By their rapid progress, they had given the promise of a formidable appearance on the ocean, that in time they might become a rival, even to the proud mistress of the seas: but this blow gave a fatal stroke for the prefent to all farther attempts of the kind.

After the loss of Charleston, the ship Alliance and the Deane frigate, were the only remnants left of the American navy. These were foon after fold at public auction, the navy CHAP. XIV. boards diffolved, and all maritime enterprise extinguished, except by private adventurers. They were also much less fortunate after the lofs of the public ships, than they had been at the beginning of the war: it was calculated that two out of three were generally captured by the British, after the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty. Time may again re-vive the ambition for a naval power there, as America is abundantly replete with every thing necessary for the equipment of fleets of magnitude and respectability.

After all it may justly be considered, that the constructing a national fleet, is but an addition to human mifery; for besides the vast expense of fuch equipments, the idle and licentious habits of a vast body of failors, a naval armament is only a new engine to carry death and conflagration, to diffant, unoffending, innocent nations. The havor of human life on the ocean, the great balance of evil refulting from naval engagements, if duly weighed in the fcale of equity or humanity, might lead the nations, with one general confent, to their total annihilation. Yet undoubtedly, the pride of empire and the ambition of kings, will still induce them to oppress their subjects, for the purpose of enhancing their own power, by this horrid instrument of human carnage; and that they will continue to waft death and destruction to every corner of the globe, that their maritime thunders can reach.

It is true the etiquette of modern courts usually introduces some plausible apologies, as a fort of prelude to the opening of those real scenes of war and destruction, which they are preparing to exhibit, by that monstrous engine of misery, a naval armament. "They usually "trumpet forth the godlike attributes of justice, equity, mercy, and above all, that uni-"versal benevolence and tenderness to man-"kind, with which their respective courts or sovereigns are supposed to be infinitely endu-"ed; and deplore in the most pathetic strains, "those very evils which they are bringing on, and those miseries which they are exerting "their utmost powers to inflict."

But it is to be feared it will be long before we shall see a combination of powers, whatever may be their professions, whose ultimate object is the establishment of universal equity, liberty, and peace among mankind. War, the scourge of the human race, either from religious or political pretences, will probably continue to torment the inhabitants of the earth, until some new dispensation shall renovate the passions, correct the vices, and elevate the mind of mortals beyond the pursuits of time.

The world has so long witnessed the sudden CHAP. XIV. and dreadful devastation made by naval armaments, that it is unnecessary to expatiate thereon: it is enough to observe, that the splendid display of maritime power has appeared on the largest theatres of human action. The proudest cities have unexpectedly been invaded, and the inhabitants involved in mifery, by the fire of those floating engines, in too many instances to particularize, from the first building up a Britifh navy, to the early attempt of America to ftrengthen themselves by following the example of the parent state, in building and equipping ships of war, in the beginning of their opposition to British power.

The truth of this observation may be evinced by a fingle inftance of furprife and capture, by a little fquadron under the command of commodore Hopkins, only the fecond year after hosfilities commenced between Great Britain and the colonies. The American commander of a ship of only thirty-fix guns, and seven or eight fmaller vessels, furprised New Providence, captured the governor, lieutenant governor, and other officers of the crown, feized near an hundred pieces of cannon, and carried off all the warlike stores on the island. But not habituated to the usual cruelties exercised on such occasions, though they continued there two or three weeks, they offered no infult to the inhabitants, and took possession of no private property without paying for it. This was an inftance of lenity that feldom falls under obfervation, where men have been longer inured to fcenes and fervices that harden the heart, and too frequently banish humanity from the breast of man.

The fmall naval armament constructed by the United States, did not continue long enough in existence, either to attempt great enterprise, or to become hardened by the cruel achievements confequent on the invasion of cities, towns, and villages, and defolating them by the fudden torrents of fire poured in upon their in-Some future day may, however, habitants. render it necessary for Americans to build and arm in defence of their extensive fea-board, and the preservation of their commerce; when they may be equally emulous of maritime glory, and become the fcourge of their fellowmen, on the fame grade of barbarity that has been exhibited by fome other nations.

FROM the concise mode of narration hitherto observed in these annals, a particular detail of naval operations will not be expected. Yet it is necessary to look a little back, and observe that an infular war had raged between the British and French in the West Indies, during the winter of one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, though they had not yet received any intelligence, that a formal declaration of hostilities between those two potent nations had taken place.

The island of Dominica was seized by the marquis de Bouille, governor of Martinico, as early as September, one thousand seven hunCHAP. XV dred and feventy-eight; but the terms imposed on the inhabitants by the conqueror, were so mild, that they scarcely felt the change of sovereignty. No licentious rudeness, or avaricious pillage, was permitted by the humane and honorable commander, who, through all his conduct in the West Indies, exhibited a specimen of that generous compassion always honorary to the conqueror and to human nature.

The lofs of the island of Dominica was peculiarly mortifying to the court of St. James, as it had been ceded to Great Britain on the last peace, as a kind of balance of accounts, after a very expensive war with the house of Bourbon.

Admiral Barrington with a confiderable force, lay at this time at Barbadoes, in a very anxious and inactive state. He had yet no orders for hostile operations; but he was soon after relieved by the arrival of sive thousand men commanded by general Grant, convoyed by six ships of the line and a number of frigates, under the direction of commodore Hotham. The want of instructions, and even of intelligence that might be depended on, had exceedingly embarrassed the British admiral: but on Hotham's arrival, an expedition to the island of St. Lucia was prosecuted with celerity and success.

The chevalier de Micaud, the commandant, xook all the precaution of a brave and judicious officer. The main point was to prevent the completion of the British fuccess, until he fhould be relieved by the arrival of the French fquadron from Boston, which he had the higheft reason every moment to expect. The count de Estaing had formed the defign, and was in force fufficient, to have fwept all the leeward islands, before the junction of admiral Barrington and commodore Hotham. But interrupted in his military progrefs by a fecond violent gale in the American feas, and feldom a favorite of fortune, he did not appear in fight of St. Lucia until the last French flag was struck. He however made fome spirited, but successless efforts for the recovery of the islands. The vigilance and valor of the British commander defeated this defign: to which was added the mortification of repeated disappointment, in feveral valiant rencounters with the bold and refolute English.

Though the count de Estaing's ships were equal in force, and experience had shewn that neither his officers nor seamen were descient in courage, yet after he quitted St. Lucia, he apparently declined a general engagement, and within ten days withdrew to Port Royal. He was frequently insulted while there by the appearance of challenge from the British slag; but he still adhered to his own system of inaction, determined to undertake no capital stroke before the arrival of fresh reinforcements from Europe. It was not until the month of June, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine, that this event took place, when the arrival of monsieur de la Motte, with every thing necessary for the most vigorous naval operations, excited the count de Estaing to immediate enterprise.

The first object of attack was the valuable island of St. Vincents, which had formerly cost much British blood to arrest and secure, by the cruel attempt to exterminate the unfortunate and innocent Caraibs. After the easy acquisition of this island, the count proceeded to the Grenades. He there landed two or three thousand men under the command of count Dillon, a brave Irish officer in the French service. He also headed a strong column himself, and attempted to carry the most defensible fortress by storm. His fuperiority of strength insured his success; and lord Macartney was obliged to offer a furrender, on the propofals of capitulation he had at first rejected; but the count received and treated the governor's flag with an unbecoming hauteur. He made new and fevere propofals in fuch a tone of defiance and contempt; that both the governor and the inhabitants chofe rather to furrender at discretion, than to bind themfelves to fuch hard conditions, as neither the customs of nations nor the justice of courts had usually required.

There is much reason to believe, that the count de Estaing did not exercise all the lenity that ought to be expected from a brave and generous conqueror. On the contrary, after this new acquisition, the inhabitants were plundered and distressed; an unbounded license raged among the soldiery, till their excesses were checked by the humanity of count Dillon, who paid every attention to the miseries of the people; and supported by his own regiment, he rendered the condition of the conquered island less deplorable.

The capture of St. Lucia was in a degree fatal to the conquerors. The noxious air of an unhealthy island, in a burning climate, did more than the fword of France to waste the veterans of Britain. Sickness and mortality raged and cut down the troops; and the squadron weakened by the departure of admiral Byron, to convoy the homeward bound fleet of merchantmen, nothing of consequence was attempted in his absence.

When he returned, both St. Vincents and the Grenades were in the hands of the French; but so uncertain were the accounts at first received, of the wretched situation of the Grenades, that the British commander determined to hazard an attempt for their relief. This brought on a general, though not a decisive action. It was supported on both sides with laudable spirit and bravery; but they finally separated without victory on either. Yet the proud and gallant Britons, whose island has long assumed the haughty style of mistress of the seas, who have justly boasted their superiority in naval engagements, could not forbear to claim the advantage in this doubtful conssict. But it is certain the wounded sleets under the admirals Barrington and Byron, found some dissiculty in reaching St. Christophers, without some of their ships falling into the hands of their enemy.

The count de Estaing returned to Grenada; and the lillies of France waved for a short time in the West Indies; and the English admirals were insulted in their turn, by the parade of the French sleet before St. Christophers, in the same manner lord Barrington had before manœuvred in vain at Martinico, without provoking the Frenchmen to engage. After these partial successes, the count de Estaing soon left the tropical seas, and repaired again to the American continent, where the assistance of a naval sorce was by this time exceedingly wanted, to aid the operations of the Americans.

The fouthern campaign had been opened the preceding year, by the feizure of the capital of Georgia. Sir Henry Clinton, late in the autumn of one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, had ordered a large detachment of Heffian, British and provincial troops, under the command of lieutenant colonel Campbell, to Savannah, to affish major general Prevost in further profecuting some unexpected advantages he had already gained. They were escorted by a small squadron under the command of commodore Parker, and arrived in the Savannah the twenty-seventh of December.

The ftate of Georgia was at this time in a very weak and defenceless fituation. Their frontiers were exposed to the depredations of the favages; and the rude incursions of the wild borderers who mixed with them, had often been so troublesome, as to require the call of the fouthern militia to check their outrages. Colonel Campbell landed his troops immediately on his arrival in the river, and by several spirited and judicious movements, possessed himself of the town of Savannah, the capital of the state, with little or no loss, and obliged general Robert Howe, a gentleman of North Carolina, who commanded a party of about eight hundred militiz, to retreat with precipitation.

Orders had been previously given by fir Henry Clinton to major general Prevost, the commander in chief in East Florida, to repair with all possible expedition, to aid the invasion and reduction of Georgia. This active officer immediately collected his remote cantonments, and with dispatch and perseverance, pushed his march through a hot and barren country of great extent. Surmounting innumerable difficulties and fatigue, he reached Sunbury, and took possession of the town and garrison, before Campbell had possessed himself of Savannah.

Both military skill and a great degree of humanity, marked this first important enterprise in the fouth. The British commander forbid that the inhabitants not in arms should be either molested or plundered; and by promises and proclamations, encouraged them to submit quietly to the authority of the parent state. Some acquiesced by inclination, and many impelled by necessity, appeared ready to enlist under the British standard; others, of more bold and independent sentiments, made their escape across the river, with the hope of an asylum in South Carolina.

These successes again encouraged the disaffected and disorderly people, who had long infested the back parts of North Carolina, to renew their incursions. Those insurgents had been apparently subdued, their leaders cut off, and their spirits broken, in the beginning of the American convulsions; but their aversion to the reigning powers in that state, still rankled in their breasts: they had impatiently waited an opportunity of displaying it, in all the sierce and cruel modes of savage war, in conjunction with the neighbouring Indians, to whom they CHAP. XV. had attached themselves.

They confidered this a favorable crisis, and again left their rural occupations. They united with fome fcattering parties of the fame description, on the borders of South Carolina and Georgia, embodied themselves, and in their progress committed every outrage, that might be expected from an armed banditti. But on an attempt to join general Prevost, their main body was attacked by the provincial militia, many of them cut off, and others taken prisoners; the remainder fled to the frontiers of Georgia, where, with their old affociates of the wilderness, and all others who could be collected in the back fettlements, they united to aid general Prevoft in his future operations.

The hazardous fituation of Georgia, and the imminent danger of the wealthy state of South Carolina, had fpread an alarm that awakened to immediate exertion for the recovery of the one, and the fecurity of the other. General Lincoln had feafonably been fent forward to take the command in the fouthern department. He reached Savannah a fliort time after colonel Campbell's arrival there; but he found himfelf not in fo eligible a fituation as might have been wished. The number of troops under his command fell far short of expectation: the artillery and ftores were infufficient; and every difficulty was enhanced by the want of order and discipline in the militia, who refused to submit to the necessary subordination of armies: they left their posts and retired at pleasure.

General Lincoln however, confistent with his usual disposition on all occasions, endeavoured to make the best of his situation. He continued himself at Purisburgh, with the main body of his army, and ordered general Ashe, with a detachment of two thousand men, to take a strong post at a place called Briar Creek. His design was to secure the upper part of the country against the loyalists, who were every where collecting their strength.

Soon after general Ashe had taken possession of the advantageous post, that in the opinion of the principal officers, promised perfect security, general Prevost formed and executed the design of surprising him there. To facilitate this judicious measure, he made such arrangements on the banks of the Savannah, as took off the attention of general Lincoln: at the same time, he ordered his brother, colonel Prevost, by a circuitous march of sifty miles, to fall unexpectedly on Ashe's party at the creek. The success of the enterprise justified the design; the whole detachment was routed, many of them killed or captured; and thus the way was opened for the loyalists, and their copper-colored allies in the back country, to join Prevost without molestation. After this action which took place the third of March, the two parties feparated by the river, continued quietly in their own posts, till the latter end of the month of April, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine. Savannah, Sunbury, and some other towns, were in the hands of the British, and the state by proclamation, laid under military government: yet the people in general considered themselves as belonging to the union.

General Lincoln, zealous to procure an election of delegates to congress from Georgia, which he expected would be impeded by violence, left his advantageous situation on the lower part of the river, and moved towards Augusta. This was rather an unfortunate movement, as, had he continued his first station, he might have secured Charleston for a time. Indeed, there was then little reason to apprehend any immediate danger in that quarter; yet he had the precaution to leave general Moultrie, with sifteen hundred men to guard the passes of the river.

The campaign in Georgia however, did not redound much to the advantage of the American arms, or to the honor of general Lincoln. It was thought by fome, he did not difcover himself a judicious and experienced commander, who had penetration to calculate on fortuitous events, or resources at hand to extricate himself, when they unexpectedly took place.

Yet he fupported a character, cool and brave, under a variety of difappointments. He was however, led a circuitous dance from place to place, by the rapid movements of general Prevost through the state of Georgia, until he was obliged to move with more ferious prospects towards Charleston.

The loss of his party at Briar Creek, was no more than might have been expected from the activity and vigor of such an officer as Prevost, attending more to his military renown, than to the political manœuvres of the state. While general Lincoln was canvassing for the election of a delegate to congress,* the commander of the forces of his antagonist was intent only on winning success in the field.

The active Prevost seized the moment of advantage; suddenly crossed the river in different parts, and penetrated into South Carolina, with little or no opposition. The party under Moultrie, consisting chiefly of militia, on seeing themselves surrounded on all sides by British troops, retreated hastily, and secured themselves within the city of Charleston.

General Prevost having thus succeeded, even beyond his most sanguine expectations, in several enterprises of considerable moment, inspired by his own wishes, and prompted by the importunities of the loyalifts, he formed the bolder resolution of pushing directly for Charleston. He arrived at the river Ashley on the eleventh of May, croffed it, and within a few days fummoned the city to furrender. Nor had he any reason for some time, to regret the determination. He had every affurance from the difaffected Americans, that Charleston would furrender without refistance, and that they had the best authority for this decided opinion; nor did they in this inftance fo totally difappoint the expectations of their British friends, as they frequently had done, and continued to do in their subsequent informations. It is true general Prevost did not immediately succeed to the full completion of his hopes; but on the first summons to surrender, the citizens affured him, that no opposition should be made, provided they might be permitted to continue in a state of neutrality to the conclusion of the war.

* There was an effort to defeat this measure, which general Lincoln judged it necessary to counteract, bearing in mind the interests of his country in civil as well as military matters.

This was the only inftance in America of an offer made so derogatory to the honor of the union. No single state, whatever might be their distresses, ever expressed a wish during the war, to be bound to a neutral repose, while their sister states were bleeding at every pore, in support of the general cause. The conduct of the citizens of Charleston cannot be accounted for, but from the momentary panic to which the human mind is liable, when fudden danger presses, before it has time to collect its own fortitude, and to act with decision and dignity, consistent with previous principles.

South Carolina had been diftinguished for the bold and active part, taken by that state against the measures of Britain. This was the first fouthern colony, after Virginia, who adopted the proposal of a general congress; nor was there now any reason to suspect any defection in the bulk of the inhabitants, though there were numbers in the city of Charleston, attached to the royal cause. Her patriots were unshaken, her officers brave; and the fubsequent conduct of the people at large, and the fufferings of individuals, effaced the unfavorable impressions this propofal might have left, had it not have been wiped off by the vigorous opposition afterwards made to a fuccessful foe, both in their councils and in the field, amidst the extremes of peril, personal danger, and public misery.

General Prevost, encouraged by success, and animated by his own personal bravery, united with the hope of subduing Charleston, rejected the offer of neutrality, and all surther negociation ceased. The city immediately recovered its former spirit, and preparation was made on both sides for the most vigorous attack and defence.

General Lincoln had been rather flow in his movements, having been deceived into an opinion, that Prevost had no farther design in crossing the river Savannah, than to procure forage and provisions. But foon finding more ferious consequences were to be expected, he hastened on with his whole force, and made his arrangements with fo much judgment and alacrity, that general Prevoft thought it prudent to withdraw from before the city, left his retreat should be cut off. He encamped his troops on the islands before the harbor, where he continued for some time, in anxious expectation of reinforcements from New York. This being delayed until the advance of the intense heats, and the fickly feafon of that country came on, which rendered it in some measure necessary to suspend all vigorous operations in that quarter, little else was done there this year, except the indifcriminate plunder of the wealthy inhabitants of the state, who were out of the reach of the protection of their friends.

Affairs in Georgia requiring his presence, general Prevost repaired there soon after the siege of Charleston was raised. He left a sorce sufficient in Port Royal to encourage his friends, by keeping up the appearance of some permanent establishment in that province, where he meant soon to return. But early in the autumn, the unexpected arrival of the squadron commanded by the count de Estaing, on the fouthern coast, gave the flattering promise of a new face to the affairs of Georgia and the Carolinas.

The admiral on his arrival in the Savannah, landed his troops with all poslible expedition, and in conjunction with the Americans, laid fiege to the capital of Georgia. On the fixteenth of September, he demanded a furrender of the town to the arms of the king of France. The fummons was in language that rather excited terror than allurement, and would have determined an officer of less courage and resolution than general Prevost, to defend the town to the laft. The fituation of Savannah was indeed fcarcely defenfible; but refolved not to yield but in the last extremity, Prevost returned a polite, but evalive answer to the French commander; and had the address to obtain a truce of twenty-four hours to deliberate.

In this fortunate interval, the arrival of colonel Maitland, with a body of troops from Port Royal, put an end to deliberation. All thoughts of furrender were laid afide, and a most gallant defence made. The town was bombarded for five days, to the great terror and distress of the inhabitants. In this predicament, general Prevost wrote and requested the count de Estaing, that the women and children, with his own wife and family, might be fent down the river, and placed under the protection of one of the French ships. After some delay, he had the mortification to receive an unpolite and cruel refusal.

As this answer was signed by both the French and American commanders, censure for want of humanity fell equally on each. It is not improbable the fevere language it contained, might be defigned to intimidate, and haften a furrender, and thereby prevent the further effusion of blood. Yet there appeared a want of generofity unbecoming the politeness of the Frenchman, and inconfistent with the well known humanity of the American commander. Of this they feemed to be fensible within a few days, when fortune began to change her face. Apologies were made both by general Lincoln and the count, for this indelicate refusal: great tenderness was therein expressed for the inhabitants, and every civility offered, particularly to the general's lady and family, and a ship assigned as an afylum for herfelf and friends. General Prevost replied to this offer of kindness, extorted by apprehension if not by fear, that "what had been once refused in terms of in-"fult, could in no circumstances be deemed " worth the acceptance."

The little time gained by this fhort parley for the purposes of civility, was improved by general Prevost to great advantage in every view. With indefatigable industry he strengthened his old works; and, assisted by the spirit and capacity of Mr. Moncrief, the chief engineer, he erected new ones with celerity and judgment, very honorable to his military talents, and consistent with his zeal and alacrity on all occasions.

The arrival of an officer of colonel Maitland's abilities, accompanied by a confiderable reinforcement, was indeed a very fortunate circumstance at this period for the commander at Savannah. Stimulated by a recent affront, and urged on by a constitutional activity, and a thirst of military applause, general Prevost seemed to bid defiance to the combined forces of France and America, and repulsed them in every quarter.

On the eleventh of October, the beliegers attempted to ftorm the town, but were defeated with great flaughter. They however kept up the appearance of a blockade until the fixteenth, when they requested a truce to bury their dead, and take care of their wounded. This was readily granted by Prevost. The conflict had been bloody indeed, and both fides equally wished for time to perform this charitable and necessary business. Soon after the melancholy work of interring many of their comrades, the French and the Americans took the advantage of a dark and foggy night, and retreated with all possible precipitation, breaking down the bridges as they passed, to impede the pursuit of their enemies, if they should be disposed to follow them.

The count de Estaing had now an opportunity to furvey the condition of his fleet; when he found the failors fickly and dispirited; nor was the army less so, from the unhealthiness of the climate, and the failure of their late enterprife. The count himfelf had been wounded in the course of the siege, and several of his best officers were either killed or wounded. The loss of very many of his men in this decided repulse, with the difgrace that every commander thinks he incurs, when the expectation of fuccess from great defigns is defeated, deeply affected the mind of the French commander. Thus unfortunately disappointed in the spirited attack on the town of Savannah, he found it necessary, from a combination of untoward circumstances, to abandon the design of recovering Georgia. In a fhort time after this, the French commander bade adjeu to the American feas.

He had never been difgraced by any deficiency in military ability, knowledge, or fpirit, while acting in behalf of the United States: yet a feries of disappointments had prevented his reaping the laurels, the just reward of bravery, or rendering much service to his allies, who had received him with the highest marks of cordiality and expectation.*

The fummons of the count de Estaing to the British commander, to surrender the capital of one of the states to the arms of his most christian majesty, was neither pleasing, prudent, or productive of harmony and considence, between the French under his command and the Americans. It occasioned some discontent at the time; and perhaps some jealous Americans did not regret, that the recovery of Georgia was lest to an officer of merit in their own corps, sent forward afterwards by general Greene, who had been the favorite of fortune, of the people, and of the commander in chief.

This was done at a period of complicated difficulties, when general Greene could not leave the state of South Carolina himself, but in the abilities of general Wayne he had the utmost considence. The event shewed that this considence was not misplaced. We shall fee hereafter general Wayne was fent on, and had the honor of finishing the war in Georgia, and the pleasure of witnessing the evacuation of the troops from their strong holds in that state, annihilating the last remains of British authority there, and recovering again the youngest of the sister states, to their former union.

In the repulse before Savannah, many valorous and gallant officers fell. Among this number was the count Pulaski, a Polish nobleman of great confideration. His bravery and enterprifing spirit was celebrated, not only in America, but in his own country. He had once, amidst the fierce contests of the miserable Polanders, in the height of his zeal for the recovery and support of the liberties of that nation, feized on the person of the king of Poland, and for a time held him his prisoner; and though he had with him only two or three, whom he deemed trusty associates, one of them relented, and betrayed him: the king was faved, and the count obliged to fly.* A few years after, he repaired to America, where he found a field ample enough for the exercise of his foldierly talents, to cherish his love of freedom, and to fupport the military character of his ancestors and his family, many of whom furvived this heroic officer.

^{*} A full narrative of this transaction may be seen in Coxe's Travels through Russia, &c. &c.

CHAP. XV.

The count Pulaski was not the only officer of his nation who distinguished himself in the American war; but the count Kosciusko, for his firmness, his valor, and his sufferings, merits particular notice. He was amiable and virtuous, as well as brave, and supported a character that will seldom be passed over in silence, in a history of either Poland or America.

The kingdom of Poland had for years exhibited a most striking monument of human misery. Their struggles for liberty, the pride of the nobles, the ignorance and barbarism of the peafantry, their unftable confederacies, the ufurpation of princes, and the interference of neighbouring monarchs, rendered it a scene of carnage, for feveral ages previous to the expulsion of Stanislaus Augustus, their ruin as a nation, and the partition of their country among the crowned defpots that furrounded them. fovereign of Poland was dethroned; the kingdom partitioned among the trio combined for that purpofe, Frederick, Catherine, and Maria Therefa. Many of the inhabitants were fent to plant colonies in the cold and distant regions of Siberia, and other parts of the Russian domains. Some of the nobility furvived under the heavy yoke of their victorious neighbours; others had fled, and lent their valorous arms to England, France, and America.

This melancholy termination of efforts grounded in nature and reason, might for a time fmother the spark of freedom implanted in every human breast, which yet almost every man, when ascending the pedestal of power, endeavours to extinguish in the bosom of all but himself. But the missortunes of their country, or their own personal sufferings, could not deaden the slame of liberty and independence, that burnt in the bosoms of many noble-minded Polanders: though the distractions of their native country obliged them to abandon it, their enthusiasm was cherished amidst strangers, and they lent their veteran abilities to aid the emancipation of others from the degrading yoke of servitude.

CHAP. XV.

The character of no one of this diftinguished band became more conspicuous, than that of the count Kosciusko, who survived the sierce conflicts to which his bravery exposed him through the revolutionary war in America.* His subsequent transactions in his native country, his valor, his misfortunes, and his renown, are too well known, and too replete with extraordinary events, to record in this place.

While we admire the patriotism, bravery, and other virtues, that adorned the characters of some individuals among the heroes of that ill-fated country, the deplorable situation of Poland should forever stand as a memento to all other nations, who claim or maintain any degree of freedom. By their private animosities, jealousies, and dissensions, all considence was destroyed, and all patriotism annihilated, except in the bosoms of a few, until their king was dethroned, the nobility laid prostrate, the country drenched in blood, and the people driven into banishment by thousands, and obliged to wear out a miserable existence, under the authority of the arbitrary sovereigns who had completed the ruin of their liberty, their government, and their country.

The history of Poland is indeed an awful leffon to every republic, where the feeds of diffension begin to spring up among the people. Those symptoms, when nurtured by faction, and strengthened by jealousies among themselves, render the people an easy prey to foreign invaders, and too generally terminate in a tragic catastrophe, similar to that of the Poles; who no longer continued a distinct nation, after the æra which has stained the annals of Europe by the shameful partition treaty, preconcerted in the cabinets of Russia, Prussia, and Germany, and announced by the joint declaration of their sovereigns, in one thousand seven hundred and seventy-three.

The inhabitants of Poland were now the fubjects and flaves of those usurping princes, who had feized and divided the kingdom; tranf- CHAP. XV. planted the inhabitants of the territory to diftant regions, and re-peopled the depopulated country with the foldiers of Prussia, Germany, and the northern potentates, who had long trained their own subjects to bend in silence, under the voke of fervility.

The partition of Poland was a fingular event in the hiftory of Europe, where the great powers, inattentive to the balance about which they had for many years expressed so much solicitude, viewed this extraordinary circumstance with little or no emotion. Whatever may be the effect on the general state of Europe, it is yet uncertain, whether the Poles loft fo much by the change as has been apprehended.

It is difficult to fay in what period of the hiftory of Poland, they had any proper claim to the honor of a free, republican form of government. The people had long groaned under the unbridled oppression and power of a proud domestic aristocracy. The absurd veto, designed as a check, only increased their discontents, jealoufies, rancor, and confusion. They had indeed a nominal king, more the subject of a foreign power, than the fovereign of his own country. They are now under the iron hand of foreign despotism. Whether that, or the scourge of CHAP. XV.

aristocracy, is the most productive of vassalage and misery, is a problem yet undecided. We leave deeper politicians to determine if they can, which is the most abhorrent to the feelings of humanity. But the discussion of the constitution of the Poles, is not a part of the business of the present work. Yet the ruin of Poland may be viewed as an example and a warning to other nations, particularly to those who enjoy a free, elective, representative government.

FROM the unavoidable inactivity of the CHAP. XVI. Americans in some parts of the continent, and the misfortunes that had attended their arms in others, in the fummer of one thousand seven hundred and feventy-nine, fir Henry Clinton was left without any impediment, to profecute a well concerted expedition to the fouthern colonies. The opulence of the planters there, the want of discipline in their militia, the distance and difficulty of reinforcing them, and the fickly state of the inhabitants, promifed an eafy conquest and a rich harvest to the invaders.

The fummer and autumn passed off; and it was late in the month of December, before general Clinton embarked. He had a strong body of troops, and a forcible squadron commanded by admiral Arbuthnot, who accompanied him; but they proceeded heavily on their way; and it was not until the ensuing spring was far advanced, that the admiral passed the bar, and made himself master of the harbor of Charleston.

The Americans flattered themselves for some time, that they should be able to make an effectual resistance to the passage of the British sleet up the Cooper river: (this passes on one side, and the Ashley runs on the other of the town of Charleston:) but they soon abandoned every ground to the potent English, except the town of Charleston, which they determined to defend to the last extremity.

Governor Rutledge was vested by the legislature with very extraordinary powers, which he was obliged to exercise in their full latitude. This gentleman had acted on all occasions with spirit and judgment becoming his character, both as a soldier and a magistrate. He immediately called out the militia; and published a proclamation, directing all the inhabitants who claimed any property in the town, to repair immediately to the American standard, on pain of consistation. Though couched in strong and fevere terms, this proclamation had little effect. CHAP. XVI. The manifest reluctance of some to oppose the power of Britain, the dread that others felt of fo potent an adversary, the ill fuccess of the American arms in Georgia, the furprife of the cavalry and other parties that were coming to their relief, the arrival of British reinforcements, and the rapid advance they made to conquest, appalled the inhabitants, and obliged the citizens foon to abandon all hopes of even faving their town.

The first fummons of furrender, on the fixteenth of April, was rejected by the American commander, though it announced the dreadful confequences of a cannonade and storm, which would foon be the unhappy fate of Charleston, "fhould the place, in fallacious fecurity, or the "commander, in wanton indifference to the "fate of the inhabitants, delay a furrender." General Lincoln replied, that he had received the joint fummons of general Clinton and admiral Arbuthnot; that "fixty days had paffed "fince it had been known, that their intentions "against the town of Charleston were hostile; "in which, time had been afforded to abandon "it; but that duty and inclination pointed to "him the propriety of defending it to the last "extremity."

advantage in favor of the British, till the eighth of May, when sir Henry Clinton again called on the American commander, to prevent the farther effusion of blood, by an immediate surrender. He warned him, that "if he refused "this last summons, he should throw on him "the charge, of whatever vindictive severity "an exasperated soldiery might instict on the "unhappy people: that he should wait his an-"fwer till eight o'clock, an hour beyond which, "resistance would be temerity."

General Lincoln fummoned a council on this occasion, who were unanimously of opinion, that articles of capitulation should be proposed.* The terms offered were several of them rejected, others were mutilated; and all relaxation or qualification being refused by the British commander, it was as unanimously agreed, that hostilities should again re-commence on the enfuing day. Accordingly, an incessant sire was kept up from the ninth to the eleventh, when an address from the principal inhabitants of the town, and a number of the country militia, expressed their satisfaction in the terms already offered by general Clinton: at the same time, the lieutenant governor and council requested, that negociations might be renewed, and that they might not be subjected to the horrors of a city taken by storm.

^{*} This general view of the fiege and furrender of Charleston, is principally collected from general Lincoln's defence and apology in a letter to general Washington, which the author was favored with the perusal of in manuscript, by general Lincoln.

CHAP. XVI.

The militia of the town had thrown away their arms; the troops on the lines were worn down with fatigue, and their provisions exhausted: thus closely invested on every side, a disaffected, factious party within, no hopes of succor from without, and all possibility of retreat cut off, general Lincoln again offered terms of surrender, little variant from Clinton's proposals. They were acceded to, and signed the twelsth of May.

Though the conditions were not the most favorable to the inhabitants, or honorary to the foldier, yet perhaps they were as lenient as could be expected from an enemy confident of fuccefs, and as honorable as could be hoped, in the desperate situation to which the Americans were reduced. The continental troops were to retain their baggage, but to remain prisoners of war until exchanged. Seven general officers were among the prisoners. The inhabitants of all conditions were to be confidered as prisoners on parole; but they foon experienced the feverities usually felt by a conquered city. All who were capable of bearing arms, were enrolled in the British service : and the whole state laid under heavy contributions.

CHAP. XVI.

The lofs of Charleston, the great number of the captured, and the shipping that fell in its defence, was a severe blow to America. Much censure was cast on general Lincoln for neglecting a timely retreat, and for attempting the defence of the town against such superior force, both by sea and land: but it must be acknowledged, he did all that could be expected from an officer of courage, to save the capital and the state; or from a man of humanity, to make the best possible terms for the inhabitants. He afterwards justified the measure by a sull detail of the invasion, and the motives for his conduct, to the satisfaction of the commander in chief, and of his country.

General Lincoln certainly had great merit, in many respects: yet it may be observed, sew officers have been equally fortunate in keeping up the eclat of character, who have so frequently failed in enterprize: for, however unjust it may be, yet military same more generally depends on successful events, than on bold design, or judicious system. Victory had seldom followed in the rear of any of his exploits: yet from his known bravery and patriotism, from his acknowledged integrity and honor, he escaped the censure frequently attached to unfortunate heroes, and which might have fallen heavily on a general of more doubtful character.

Before fir Henry Clinton left Charleston, fome new and fevere regulations took place, that could not well be justified, either by the letter or the spirit of the capitulation. All perfons in the city were forbidden the exercise of their commercial pursuits, excepting such as were the decided friends of the British government. Confiscation and death were threatened by proclamation, to any who should be found in arms, unless in support of royal authority. All capable of bearing arms were enrolled for British service: such as had families were permitted to continue near them, and defend the state against their American brethren; those who had none were required to ferve fix months out of twelve, in any part of the fouthern states.

Many inhabitants of the principal towns, and indeed a great part of the state of South Carolina, despairing of any effectual resistance, and unwilling to abandon their connexions and their property, laid down their arms, and submitted either as prisoners of war, or subjects to the king of Great Britain: and even congratulatory addresses were fabricated, and signed by great numbers of respectable characters in Charleston, and offered to the British commanders on the success of their arms. Thus from motives of interest or fear, many who had appeared to be actuated by higher principles, flooped to the fervile homage of the fycophant, and flattered the victors on the conquest of their country; an acquisition that reduced their countrymen to beggary, and themselves to slavery.

Soon after these arrangements, fir Henry Clinton, vainly flattering himfelf that he had entirely fubdued one wealthy colony, at the extremity of the continent, and that every thing was in a hopeful train for other brilliant strokes of military prowefs, left the command of the fouthern department to lord Cornwallis, and repaired himself to New York. His lordship immediately detached a ftrong body under the command of lord Rawdon, to march, to fubjugate, and guard the frontiers, while he turned his own attention to the commercial regulations, and the civil government of the newly conquered province. But he foon found the aid of auxiliaries, impelled by fear, or stimulated by the hope of present advantage, is not to be depended on, and that voluntary compacts are the only focial ties confidered among mankind as binding on the confcience.

On the first opportunity, many persons exchanged their paroles for certificates of their being good subjects, and immediately returned to the country, or to the neighbouring state, and stimulated their friends to resistance. A remarkable instance of this nature was exhibited in the conduct of colonel Lisle, a brave American officer; who, after an exchange of the parole, decamped from the British standard, and carried off with him a whole battalion to the aid of colonel Sumpter, and other spirited officers, who were in motion on the borders of both the Carolinas.

The new regulations, and the hard conditions enjoined on them by the conqueror, were highly refented by many of the principal inhabitants of Charleston. Their diffatisfaction was fo apparent, that they foon fell under the fufpicion and displeasure of the commander. Some allegations were brought against them, though far from being fufficiently founded. They were charged with treasonable practices and defigns against government; arrested in their beds, fent on board prison ships, confined and treated with great rigor, and in a fhort time fent off to St. Augustine. Among this number was lieutenant governor Gadsden, a gentleman early distinguished for his patriotism, his firmnefs, his republican principles, and his uniform exertions to emancipate his country from the shackles of British government.

Nothing appeared to justify the severities exercised towards these gentlemen; nor was there any reason to believe they had forfeited their honor. The rigorous policy of a conquering foe, was all that was offered in vindication of this ftep. But it is certain the Carolinians in general evinced the difficulty of holding men by political fetters, while the mind revolts at the authority that has no claim but what arifes from the laws of conquest.

Lord Rawdon was extremely active on the frontiers. No exertion was wanting on the part of this valiant officer, to bring the whole country to a united fubmission to royal authority; and a diversion was made in the Chefapeake, under the command of general Leslie, in favor of the operations in the Carolinas. Yet within two months after the furrender of Charleston, opposition to British government again resumed a stable appearance.

Marches, counter-marches, furprife, pillage, and maffacre, had for fome months pervaded the frontiers; and whichever party gained the advantage, the inhabitants were equally wretched. But a particular detail of the miferies of the fouthern states through this period, would be more painful than entertaining to the reader, and is a task from which every writer of humanity would wish to be excused. Imagination may easily paint the distresses, when surveying on the one side, a proud and potent army slushed with recent success, and irritated by opposition from an enemy they despised, both as Americans and as rebels; their spirit of revenge continually whetted by a body of refugees who followed them, embittered beyond description against their countrymen, and who were joined by a banditti who had no country, but the spot that yielded a temporary harvest to their rapacious hands: rapine and devastation had no check.

On the other fide, little less severity could be expected from a brave and high-fpirited people, not foftened by the highest refinements of civilization, warmed by the impulse of retaliation, driven almost to despair, and under every painful apprehension for their lives, their property, their liberty, and their country: thefe were joined by the foldiers of fortune, and the fierce borderers, who had not yet been taught to yield quietly, either to military or civil fubordination: the most striking outrages were every where committed. But no partifan diftinguished himself more on either side, than a colonel Tarleton, who made himfelf a character in the ravage of the Carolinas, equally confpicuous for bravery and barbarity; and had the effrontery afterwards in England, to boaft in the presence of a lady of respectability, that he had killed more men, and ravished more women, than any man in America.*

^{*} This was fo highly refented by the lady, who had before been his friend, that by her influence, she defeated his hopes as a candidate for a member of parliament.

CHAP. XVI.

But not the loss of their capital, the ravage of their country, the profcription of some of the principal inhabitants, and the total ruin of some of the wealthiest families, could subdue the spirit of independence, and the aversion to British government, that had taken deep root in the bosoms of most of the inhabitants of the southern states.

Sumpter, Morgan, Marion, Lee, Caswell, Rutherford, and other brave officers, continually counteracted the intrigues of the loyalists; and attacked, haraffed, and frequently defeated the British parties, that were detached to the various parts of the country to enforce submission. Nor did the repulse in Georgia, the loss of Charleston, nor the armament sent to the Chesapeake by sir Henry Clinton, in favor of lord Cornwallis's movements, in the smallest degree check the vigorous efforts of these spirited leaders, by whose assistance a new face to the affairs of their country was soon restored.

France had this year given a new proof of her zeal in favor of American independence. The count de Rochambeau arrived on the eleventh of July at Newport, with fix thousand land forces, under cover of a respectable squadron commanded by the admiral de Tiernay. They brought the promise and the expectation of farther and immediate support, both by land and sea. Some inessectual movements were made on both fides, in confequence of these expectations: and on the arrival of admiral Graves at New York, with six fail of the line and some transports, a feint was made by sir Henry Clinton, with the affistance of those fresh reinforcements, immediately to attack the French at Rhode Island. This plan was diverted by general Washington's preparation to embrace the favorable opportunity, to strike a decided blow by the reduction of New York.

All the states east of the Delaware discovered their readiness, by all possible exertions to cooperate in the design: but amidst all the preparation and fanguine hope of the Americans, an account was received, equally mortifying to the United States, and to their allies already in America, that admiral de Guichen had sailed from the West Indies directly for France, instead of repairing with all his forces, as was expected, to aid the united operations of Washington and Rochambeau. The admiral de Tiernay died soon after at Newport. It was thought by many, that this brave officer fell a facrifice to chagrin and disappointment.

After the failure of these brilliant hopes, little more was done through the summer in the middle or eastern department, except by skirmishing parties, which served only to keep up the hope of conquest on the side of Britain, while it preserved alive some military ardor in CHAP. XVI.

the American army. But fo uncertain are the events of war, that the anticipation of fuccess, the pride of victory, or the anguish of disappointment, alternately play on the passions of men, until the convulsion gives place to tranquillity and peace, or to the still solemnity of melancholy, robbed of all its joys.

General Washington found himself at this time unable to do much more, than to guard against the uncertain inroads of a powerful fleet and a hostile army. It could not be congenial to the feelings of the military character, endowed with a spirit of enterprise, to be placed in a situation merely defensive, while too many circumstances forbade any concentrated plan, that promised any decision of the important object for which the United States were struggling.

While thus fituated, the British troops were frequently detached from New York and Staten Island, to make inroads, and by surprise to distress and destroy the settlements in the Jersies. The most important of their movements was about the twenty-sisth of June, when general Knyphausen with about sive thousand regular troops, aided by some new levies, advanced upon the right wing of the American army, commanded by major general Greene. Their progress was slow until they arrived at Springsield, where they were checked by a party of the Americans.

They had yet done little mischief on their march, but at Springfield they burnt most of the houses in the town, and retired from thence to Elizabethtown. After some time, they advanced from Elizabethtown with the whole of their infantry, a large body of cavalry, and fifteen or twenty pieces of artillery. Their march was then rapid and compact: they moved in two columns, one on the main road leading to Springfield, the other on the Vauxhall road. Major Lee with the horse and picquets, opposed the right column, and colonel Dayton with his regiment, the left; and both gave as much opposition as could have been expected from fo

CHAP. XVI.

General Greene observed in a letter to congress, that the American troops were so extended, to guard the different roads leading to the several passes over the mountains, that he had scarcely time to collect them at Springsield, and make the necessary dispositions, previous to the appearance of the enemy before the town; when a cannonade commenced between their advance and the American artillery, posted for the defence of the bridge.

of his own parties, when danger appeared from fuperior numbers. The generals Maxwell and Dickenson, the colonels Shrieve, Ogden, and others, at the head of their regiments, exhibited the highest specimens of American bravery: but the enemy continued to press on in great force. Their left column began an attack on colonel Angell, who was posted to secure a bridge in front of the town. "The action was "fevere, and lasted about forty minutes; when "superior numbers overcame obstinate brave-"ry," and forced the American troops to retire over the second bridge.

After various military manœuvres, skirmishes, and retreats, general Greene took post on a ridge of hills, from whence he detached parties to prevent the burnings of the enemy; who spread conflagration wherever it was in their power, and retreated towards Elizabethtown. This detachment from the British army sinished their marauding excursion, and re-crossed to Staten Island, July the twenty-third.

The outrage of innocence in instances too numerous to be recorded, of the wanton barbarity of the soldiers of the king of England, as they patroled the defenceless villages of America, was evinced no where more remarkably, than in the burnings and massacres that marked the footsteps of the British troops, as they from time to time ravaged the state of New Jersey.

In their late excursion, they had trod their deleterious path through a part of the country called the Connecticut Farms. It is needless to particularize many inftances of their wanton rage, and unprovoked devastation, in and near Elizabethtown. The places dedicated to public worship did not escape their fury: these were destroyed more from licentious folly, than any religious frenzy or bigotry, to which their nation had at times been liable. Yet through the barbarous transactions of this fummer, nothing excited more general refentment and compassion, than the murder of the amiable and virtuous wife of a Prefbyterian clergyman, attended with too many circumstances of grief on the one fide, and barbarism on the other, to pass over in filence.

This lady was fitting in her own house, with her little domestic circle around her, and her infant in her arms; unapprehensive of danger, shrouded by the consciousness of her own innocence and virtue; when a British barbarian pointed his musquet into the window of her room, and instantly shot her through the lungs. A hole was dug, the body thrown in, and the house of this excellent lady set on fire, and consumed with all the property it contained.

Mr. Caldwell, her affectionate hufband, was abfent: nothing had ever been alleged against his character, even by his enemies, but his zeal for the rights, and his attachment to his native country. For this he had been perfecuted, and for this he was robbed of all that he held dear in life, by the bloody hands of men, in whose benevolence and politeness he had had much considence, until the fated day, when this mistaken opinion led him to leave his beloved family, fearless of danger, and certain of their security, from their innocence, virtue, and unoffending amiability.

Mr. Caldwell afterwards published the proofs of this cruel affair, attested on oath before magistrates, by fundry persons who were in the house with Mrs. Caldwell, and saw her fall back and expire, immediately after the report of the gun. "This was," as observed by Mr. Caldwell, "a violation of every tender feeling; "without provocation, deliberately committed "in open day; nor was it ever frowned on by "the commander." The catastrophe of this unhappy family was completed within two years, by the murder of Mr. Caldwell himself, by some ruffian hands.

His confcious integrity of heart had never fuffered him to apprehend any personal danger: and the melancholy that pervaded all, on the tragical death of his lady, who was distinguished for the excellence and respectability of her char- CHAP. XVI. acter, wrought up the refentment of that part of the country to fo high a pitch, that the most timid were aroused to deeds of desperate heroism. They were ready to swear, like Hannibal against the Romans, and to bind their sons to the oath of everlasting enmity to the name of Britain.

But we shall see too many circumstances of fimilar barbarity and ferocious cruelty, to leave curiofity ungratified, or to fuffer the tear of pity to dry on the fympathetic cheek, as we follow the route of the British army. Agitation and anxiety pervaded the eastern states, while rapine and flaughter were fpread over the middle colonies. Hope was fufpended in every mind; and expectation feemed to hang on the consequences of the strong effort made to fubdue the fouthern provinces.

The present year was replete with the most active and important scenes, both in Europe and America. We leave the latter to wait the operation of events, and turn our eyes towards Great Britain, whose situation was not less perplexed and embarraffed, than that of the United States. The fources of concern which pervaded the patriotic part of the nation, were innumerable. A remarkable combination of powers against the British nation was unusually alarming. Spain had now declared war, and acted with decision: and many new and great events among other nations, threatened both the maritime and internal state of Great Britain, with checks to their pride and power which they had not before experienced.

The defpot of Russia, with haughty superiority, appeared at this time, umpire of the Armed Neutrality, set on foot by herself.* The novelty of this measure excited much observation, attention, and expectation, both in Europe and America. Some writers have robbed the empress of the honor of originating this humane project, which was thought to be levelled at the imperious sway, and the insolent aggressions of the British flag, which had long been vexatious to all the nations.

- This measure has been attributed to a stroke of policy concerted by count Panin, in order to defeat the design of sir James Harris, minister from Great Britain, who had been making ev-
- * Before this period, the wealth and inhabitants of the Turkish empire had been diminished, and the power of the Sublime Porte so far crippled, by the ambitious projects of Catharine, that they were unable to lend much assistance to any of their distressed neighbours. ery effort in favor of his court, to engage the CHAP. XVI. empress to fit out a naval armament against Spain. Prince Potemkin, the empress's favorite, was fond of the measure of affifting the court of Spain: but the determined opposition of the count Panin, against the interference of the court of Russia in the war between Great Britain and the house of Bourbon, in conjunction with the American colonies, was fuch, that the defign was not only defeated, but the court of Petersburgh took the lead in a declaration to the belligerent powers, for fettling the principles of navigation and trade; and the armament in preparation for other purposes, was fent out to support the armed neutrality.*

^{*} See History of the Armed Neutrality by a German nobleman. A more recent work has attributed the origin of this benevolent fystem, to the policy of the count de Vergennes, and has afferted that it was a plan of his own to counteract the operations of the British court against France, by this check to the power of their navy. But from the character of the count de Vergennes, as drawn by an American minister, his abilities were not equal to the comprehensive system. He observed, that "notwith-" standing the gazettes of Europe had been filled with " pompous panegyrics of this minister, and sublime ideas " of his power and credit, as well as his abilities, it was " but mere puff and bubble: and that notwithstanding " his long experience in courts, he was by no means a " great minister: that he had neither the extensive knowl-" edge, nor the forelight, nor the wifdom, nor the virtue, " nor the temper of a great man."

But fuch was the commanding genius of Catharine, and her predominant passion for the extension of her fame, that those who have studied her character will not deny her the capacity, nor the honor of originating this humane and novel fystem. She was a woman in whom were united, the most splendid talents, a magnificent taste, an unconquerable mind, the most beneficent virtues, and the most detestable crimes. But whoever was the prime mover of a fystem so benevolent, the idea was the greatest that ever entered into the head of a prince, fince the days of Henry the fourth of France.* The defign was glorious, as it might in time be so far improved, as to put a period to a great part of the diffress brought on the trade of nations, by the ambition, interest, and proud usurpation of some maritime powers.

The empress forwarded an explicit declaration of the design and the nature of the combination, to the several European courts. By ^{*} Every one acquainted with the history of France, will recollect the benevolent defign formed by Henry the fourth and his fagacious minister, the duke of Sully, to put an end to the waste of human life by war, by a combination, great, extensive, and more humane than generally falls under the contemplation of princes. His design to settle the contests of nations by amicable treaty, was defeated by the hand of the assassin, which deprived him of life this extraordinary treaty, all neutral ships were to be freely navigated from port to port on the coasts of nations at war, and the effects belonging to the subjects of any sovereign, were to be safe in all neutral vessels, except contraband merchandize. Thus the seas were to be left in the situation designed by God and nature, that all mankind might reap the benefits of a free and open intercourse with each other.

CHAP. XVI.

Several other articles, humane, just, and favorable to trade, were stipulated. Their security was guaranteed by a powerful sleet, directed by a despotic semale; while the neighbouring sovereigns, awed by her prowess, strength, and stern authority, aided her measures.

Though this was a very unpleafant proposition to the court of Great Britain, it was acceded to with alacrity by the northern powers, and by most of the other courts in Europe. Thus Sweden, Denmark, and Portugal, united with the potent court of Petersburgh, to guard and protect the trade of nations, while war raged among so many of them.

This capital measure was equally pleasing to France, Spain, and America; but to Great Britain it was a grievance of magnitude: and what greatly enhanced their mortification, it CHAP. XVI.

had originated with a fovereign whom they confidered as a friend and an ally; one to whom they had looked forward as a powerful affiftant, if the exigencies of war should oblige them to seek the further aid of foreigners. But, as a writer observed, "the folitary court of London was obliged to suppress her indigmation." Neither her resentment, chagrin, or address, could prevent a measure which Great Britain considered as particularly injurious to herself.

The British minister expostulated warmly with the court of Petersburgh, on the constant attention and regard hitherto shewn on every occasion, to the slag and commerce of Russia, by Great Britain. He declared there was a continuance of the same disposition and conduct in his court, and reminded the empress of the reciprocal ties of friendship, and the commercial interests, by which the two nations were mutually bound.

The confederacy too formidable for opposition in their present situation, an equivocal, rather than an explicit reply to the declaration of the empress, was sent by the court of Great Britain to the British envoy resident at Petersburgh, dated April the twenty-third, one thousand seven hundred and eighty.

While this indecisive mode of conduct was observed by the court of Great Britain, the other European powers had not only readily agreed to the proposition for an armed neutrality, but appeared generally pre-disposed to a friendly intercourse with America, if not unequivocally to support her claim to independence.

A general state of danger from foreign combinations seemed to threaten the empire of Great Britain, with a convulsion in almost all its parts; at the same time, discontent and disfatisfaction, particularly in Ireland, seemed to be on the point of rising to an alarming height, and fast approaching to a criss.

It was observed by one of their own writers, that "it was not to be expected that a country "dependent on Great Britain, and much limit-"ed in the use of its natural advantages, should "not be affected by the causes and consequences "of the American war. The sagacious in that "kingdom could not avoid perceiving in the "present combination of circumstances, an ad-"vantage which was to be now improved, or given up forever."

There now appeared a remarkable revolution in the temper of the people of Ireland, that difcovered strong symptoms of their weariness of their subordinate and depressed situation. These were doubtless quickened and brought into action, by the struggle of the Americans for independence. Early in the opposition of the united colonies to parliamentary measures, congress had forwarded a friendly address to the inhabitants of Ireland. In this they had obferved, that "the ministry had for ten years, " endeavoured by fraud and violence, to deprive "them of rights which they had for many years "enjoyed:" that "at the conclusion of the last "war, the genius of England and the spirit of "wisdom, as if offended at the ungrateful "treatment of their fons, withdrew from the "British councils, and left that nation a prey "to a race of ministers, with whom ancient "English honesty and benevolence disdained to "dwell. From that period, jealoufy, discon-"tent, oppression, and discord, have raged "among all his majesty's subjects, and filled ev-"ery part of his dominions with diftress and " complaint,"

In this address to the inhabitants of Ireland, the American delegates had recapitulated their several grievances, which had driven them to opposition, and a suspension of all commerce with Great Britain, Ireland, and the English West India islands. After observing that they hoped from this peaceable mode of opposition to obtain relies, they made a friendly apology to the Irish, for including them in this restriction, assuring them, "that it was with the ut"most reluctance we could prevail upon our-"felves, to cease our commercial connexions with your island. Your parliament had done us no wrong. You had ever been friendly to the rights of mankind: and we acknowledge with pleasure and with gratitude, that your nation has produced patriots, who have nobly distinguished themselves in the cause of humanity and America.

"On the other hand, we were not ignorant, "that the labors and manufactures of Ireland, "like those of the filk-worm, were of little mo-"ment to herfelf, but ferved only to give lux-"ury to those who neither toil nor spin. We " perceived that if we continued our commerce "with you, our agreement not to import from "Britain would be fruitless; and were there-"fore compelled to adopt a measure, to which " nothing but absolute necessity could have re-"conciled us. It gave us, however, fome con-"folation to reflect, that should it occasion " much distress, the fertile regions of America "would afford you a fafe afylum from poverty, "and in time from oppression also; an asylum "in which many thousands of your country-"men have found hospitality, peace, and afflu-"ence, and become united to us by all the ties " of confanguinity, mutual interest, and affec-66 tion. " * and Williams

"We offer our most grateful acknowledg-"ments for the friendly disposition you have "always shewn towards us. We know that "you are not without your grievances. We "fympathize with you in your diftress; and "are pleased to find, that the design of subju-"gating us, has perfuaded administration to dif-" pense to Ireland, some vagrant rays of minif-"terial funshine. Even the tender mercies of "government, have long been cruel towards "you. In the rich pastures of Ireland many "hungry parricides have fed, and grown strong "to labor in its destruction. We hope the pa-"tient abiding of the meek may not always be "forgotten: and God grant that the iniquitous " schemes of extirpating liberty from the Brit-"ish empire, may be soon defeated!

"But we should be wanting to ourselves; we should be persidious to posterity; we should be unworthy that ancestry from which we descrive our descent,—should we submit with sold—ed arms, to military butchery and depredation, to gratify the lordly ambition, or sate the ava—rice of a British ministry. In defence of our persons and properties, under actual violation, we have taken up arms: when that violation shall be removed, and hostilities cease on the part of the aggressors, they shall cease on our part also. For the achievement of this happy event, we conside in the good offices of our fellow-subjects beyond the Atlantic: of their

"friendly disposition we do not yet despond, "aware, as they must be, that they have noth"ing more to expect from the same common "enemy, than the humble savor of being last "devoured."

This energetic address to the Irish may be seen in almost every public record of the transactions of congress, in one thousand seven hundred and seventy-sive. This, with other addresses of the same determined body of men, to the inhabitants of England, of Canada, of the United States, comprise an epitome of the grievances complained of by Americans, of the existing opinions, and the cause of the colonies taking arms against the parent state.

The fimilarity of fufferings which the Irish had long felt, oppressions which had often driven them to the point of despair, a prospect of successful resistance by the colonies to the overbearing measures of the British crown and parliament, awakened in them a dawn of hope, that relief might result from union and concert among themselves, sufficient to check the present, and to prevent still greater burdens, from the usurpations of power often exercised against them, without equity or humanity.

The rifing ferment in the Irish nation was justly alarming to the court of Britain. This, with the weight of foreign combinations which CHAP. XVI.

pressed upon them, awakened apprehensions in the highest degree, in the minds of the sober and judicious, who had the welfare of the nation at heart. In addition to their concern from these causes, their differences of opinion with regard to their own internal affairs, on almost every subject, increased. This disunion of sentiment appeared in the vast number of petitions laid on the table of the house of commons, from the most respectable counties; not less than forty at once. These brought on much debate and altercation, that promised much reform and produced little.

The enormous influence of the crown, the abuse of contracts, the corruption in all departments, were discussed, and the American war again reprobated. The waste of human life, and the treasures of the nation, were pathetically lamented in the course of parliamentary debate; and this absurd and fruitless war criminated in strong language.

The strength of party was tried to its utmost, on a variety of subjects. The increasing and dangerous influence of the crown, was particularly dwelt upon: on this a member of the house* observed, that nothing more strongly evinced its existence, than the minister's keeping his place, "after so many years of loss, mis-

65 fortune, and calamity, as had already marked CHAP. XVI. "the fatal course of his administration." He asked, "whether that noble lord had not lost "America? whether he had not fquandered " many millions of the public money, and wast-"ed rivers of blood of the subjects of Great "Britain? And yet, though the whole coun-"try, with one voice, cried out against him, "and execrated his American war, the noble "lord still held his place. Could this possibly "be ascribed to any other cause than to the " overgrown influence of the crown, along "with that daring exertion of it, which fets "the voice and the interests of the people at " nought ?"

He observed that the present minister by his measures, "had funk and degraded the honor " of Great Britain. The name of an English-" man was now no longer a matter to be proud " of: the time had been when it was the envy of "all the world; it had been the introduction "to universal respect; but the noble lord had " contrived to fink it almost beneath contempt. "He had rendered his countrymen, and their "country, despicable in the eyes of every other " person."

This fession of parliament continued desultory, angry, agitated, and inconclusive, till towards the close; when all eyes were opened to immediate danger, by the distracted and incoherent conduct of lord George Gordon, at the head of the London Associators, who had combined expressly to defend the Protestant religion. They had taken the alarm from a motion made by fir George Saville, deemed too favorable to the Roman Catholic religion, though received with universal applause in the house of commons.

It is observable, that the pretext of religion had often rent in funder the bands of union. and interrupted the peace of the English nation, from the conquest to the present day. Nor had perfecution ever been pushed with a more severe hand in any part of the world, than among these islanders, all of whom professed themfelves Christians, though divided by a variety of denominations. The popish religion had been particularly inhibited from the days of the Stuarts; but as many of the nobility still adhered to the Catholic faith, a degree of liberality and toleration was indulged, and religious diftinctions, if not annihilated, had generally lain dormant among a people highly improved in politeness and erudition. Yet the same spirit of bigotry was concealed in the bosoms of many, which wanted only the contact of a torch to emblazon into the flames of perfecuting fury.

This the prefent moment prefented; and no CHAP. XVI. animofities of this nature had for many years arisen to such a height of riot, confusion, tumult, and danger, as raged in the city of London in consequence of an act recently passed, entitled "an act for relieving his majesty's sub-"jects professing the popish religion, from cer-tain penalties and disabilities, imposed on "them by an act made in the eleventh and "twelfth years of the reign of king William "the third." The zealous opposition in Scotland to any relaxation of the penal laws against the Papists, seems to have originated the Protestant affociation in England.

Though not immediately connected with American affairs, it may not be improper before we conclude this chapter, to notice, that no heat of opposition among the infurgents of the colonies, as they were termed, ever arose to such an atrocious height, as the mobs in London, in the face of the parliament of England, and under the eye of their fovereign.

The reftless and turbulent spirit and conduct of lord George Gordon, gave rife to the notorious outrages committed in and about London in the month of June, one thousand seven hundred and eighty. Enthusiastically bitter against the indulgence of the Roman Catholic religion, he carried his defigns and temper fo far, as to fpread the fame intolerant spirit through a large body of his adherents. Fifty or fixty thousand persons assembled in St. George's Fields, under the appellation of the Protestant Associators, distinguished by blue cockades in their hats, a badge which they endeavoured to assix to many well-meaning persons, whom they compelled to move in their train. The passions of the mad multitude inslamed by various artifices, they paraded the city for several days, and set fire to many elegant buildings, among which lord Manssield's house, furniture, library, and many valuable manuscripts, were destroyed.

Lord George Saville's house in Leicester Fields, fell under the refentment and fury of the rioters, professedly for his preparing and bringing a bill into parliament in favor of the Catholics. The bishop of Lincoln, and several other dignified clergymen, felt the effects of their russian and licentious hands: they were infulted, abused, and treated with the utmost rudeness and indignity. In short, plunder, rapine, anarchy, murder, and conflagration, spread in every quarter of the city. The prisoners were released, and the jails set on fire: Newgate, King's Bench, the Fleet Prison, and other public buildings deftroyed. Neither the civil authority, the remonstrances of the moderate, nor the terror of the military, were able to quell the rioters, or disperse the rabble, under four or five days, that the city blazed in fo many different and confpicuous parts, as to threaten the conflagration of that noble capital.

As foon as a degree of quiet was reftored by a dispersion of the inflamed multitude, lord George Gordon was taken into custody, and committed to the tower. After six or seven months consinement, he was tried; but as there appeared a derangement of his intellectual faculties, bordering on infanity, he was acquitted and set at liberty.

It is no fingular circumftance that a zeal for religion, or rather for a particular mode of worship, should disgrace the Christian system, by the wild fanaticism of its real or pretended votaries. It has been observed, that this was the pretext for the licentious conduct of the London Associators: their cry was religion; forgetful among the most ferocious deeds of cruelty, that the religion they oftensibly pretended to defend, was interwoven with the most rational morality, and the most fervent piety.

The fame illiberal fpirit of superstition and bigotry, has been the pretext for establishing inquisitions, for Smithfield fires, for massacres, wars, and rivers of human blood poured out on the earth, which groans beneath the complicated crimes of man. Thus, mistaken ideas of religion have often led the multitude to deeds of cruelty and madness, enkindled the fury of the affassin to murder the monarch amidst his guards, or the hapless maid in her devotional closet. The ignorant, the artful, or the illiberal children of men, have often brought forward the facred name of religion, to sanction the grossest absurdaties, to justify the most cruel persecutions, and to violate every principle of reason and virtue in the human mind.

It is a melancholy truth, that the Christian world too generally forgets that the mild spirit of the gospel dictates candor and forgiveness towards those who are differient in opinion. The example of the good Samaritan was recorded, to impress the cultivation of the benevolent affections towards all mankind, without restriction to neighbour or to country: and the sword of Peter was ordered into its scabbard, by the founder of that code of rational and just fentiment, productive of order and peace in the present stage of weakness and error.

The mild virtues of charity and brotherly kindness, are the distinguishing characteristics of this benign religion: yet it is not less humiliating than wonderful, when we calmly reslect, that mankind have seemed to delight in the destruction of their fellow-beings, from the earliest records of time to the present struggles of America, to maintain their rights at the point of the fword, against a nation long inured to the carnage of their own species.

This has been evinced, not only in the oppression of Great Britain over her own colonies, and the civil convulsions on their own island, but from the havoc made by their enormous naval armaments, which have crimsoned the ocean with human blood, carried death to their antipodes, and desolation round the globe.

To the univerfal regret of the most benevolent part of mankind, they have witnessed, that the nabobs of India have been reduced to slavery, and the innocent inhabitants of the eastern world involved in famine, poverty, and every species of misery, notwithstanding the immense resources of the most luxuriant and fertile country on earth, by the innovating, ambitious, and insolent spirit of a nation, assuming the jurisdiction of the seas, and aiming at universal domination.

The black catalogue of cruelties permitted by the English government, and executed by their myrmidons in the east, against the innocent natives of India, will leave a stain on the character of the British nation, until the memory of their deeds shall be blotted from every historic page. Nor was the system of conquest there relaxed in the smallest degree: while the Ganges and the Indus were reddened with the blood, and covered with the slaughtered bodies of men, their armies in the west were endeavouring to reduce their former colonies, to the same state of slavery and misery with the inhabitants of that distant region.

The attempted extermination of many of the primitive inhabitants, and the waste of human life through all Indostan and other parts of the eastern world, by the destroying sword of Britain, are recollections too shocking for the humane and benevolent mind to dwell on. Too melancholy a picture is exhibited, when the eye of compassion is turned towards that ill-fated country. It must in tears behold the zemidars and the nabobs in chains, their princes and princeffes of every age immerfed in poverty, stripped of their connexions, captured by the English, and dying in despair, without the cold solace of pity from their foes. All the ancient, well-informed, and ingenious inhabitants of that rich, populous, and favored fpot of creation, involved in one common ruin, exhibit the most ftriking and affecting view of the cruelties of man, and of the vicillitudes of human affairs, that modern history prefents.

These last observations indeed, may not appear to be connected with the design of the prefent work: nor have the cruelties which have been exhibited in the East Indies by the arms of Great Britain, arisen from a spirit of religious intolerance. It may however be observed, when the mind has for a moment left the more fublunary pursuits of man, and adverted to the facred theme of religion, that nothing can be a more infurmountable bar to the propagation of truth, either in the east, the west, or in the dark regions of African or Afiatic flavery, than the cruelties perpetrated by men, who profess a syftem of ethics more fublime than that of Zoroafter, morals more refined than taught by Soc-

Observations on the moral conduct of man, on religious opinion or perfecutions, and the motives by which mankind are actuated in their various pursuits, will not be censured when occasionally introduced. They are more congenial to the tafte, inclination, and fex of the writer, than a detail of the rough and terrific fcenes of war. Nor will a ferious or philosophic mind be displeased with such an interlude, which may ferve as a temporary resting-post to the weary traveller, who has trodden over the field of carnage, until the foul is fickened by a view of the abfurdity and cruelty of his own species.

These reflections may justify a short digresfion, that only means to hint at the happy confequences that might refult, if a nation which extends its power, and carries its arms to the extremities of the globe, would transmit with them, that mildness of manners, that justice, humanity, and rectitude of character, that would draw the inhabitants of the darker regions of the world, from their idolatry and superstition. Thus nations who had long been immerfed in errors, might be led to embrace a religion, admirably adapted to the promotion of the happiness of mankind on earth, and to prepare a rational agent for fome higher stage of existence, when the drama on this tragic theatre is finished.

THE year one thousand seven hundred and eighty, was a year of incident, expectation, and event; a period pregnant with future consequences, interesting in the highest degree to the political happiness of the nations, and perhaps ultimately to the civil institutions of a great part of mankind. We lest England in the preceding chapter, in a very perturbed state, arising both from their own internal dissensions, and the dread of foreign combinations, relative to their own island and its former dependencies.

describe the embarrassments suffered by congress, by the commander in chief, and by men of firmness and principle in the several legislative bodies, through this and the beginning of the next year. The scarcity of specie, the rapid depreciation of paper, which at once sunk the property and corrupted the morals of the people; which destroyed all considence in public bodies, reduced the old army to the extremes of misery, and seemed to preclude all possibility of raising a new one, sufficient for all the departments; were evils, which neither the wisdom or vigilance of congress could remedy.

At fuch a crifis, more penetration and firmnefs, more judgment, impartiality, and moderation, were requifite in the commander in chief of the American armies, than ufually fall within the compass of the genius or ability of man. In the neighbourhood of a potent army, general Washington had to guard with a very inadequate force, not only against the arms of his enemies, but the machinations of British emisfaries, continually attempting to corrupt the fidelity both of his officers and his troops.

Perhaps no one but himself can describe the complicated sources of anxiety, that at this period pervaded the breast of the first military officer, whose honor, whose life, whose country, hung suspended, not on a single point only, but on many events that quivered in the winds of CHAP.XVII. fortune, chance, or the more uncertain determinations of men. Happy is it to reflect, that these are all under the destination of an unerring hand, that works in fecret, ultimately to complete the beneficent defigns of Providence.

Some extracts from his own pen, very naturally express the agitations of the mind of general Washington, in the preceding as well as the present year. In one of his letters to a friend* he observed, " * Our conflict is not likely to "cease so soon as every good man would wish. "The measure of iniquity is not yet filled; and " unless we can return a little more to first prin-"ciples, and act a little more upon patriotic "ground, I do not know when it will-or-"what may be the iffue of the contest. At prefent, we feem to be in a chaos, "but this cannot last long, as I presume the ul-"timate determinations of the British court "will be developed at the meeting of parlia-"ment, after the holidays."

An extract of another letter from general Washington to the governor of Pennsylvania, dated August the twentieth, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, discovers the same anxiety for the sate of the contest, as the above. In this he said,—"To me it will appear mirac—"ulous if our affairs can maintain themselves much longer, in their present train. If either "the temper or the resources of the country will not admit of an alteration, we may soon expect to be reduced to the humiliating con—"dition, of seeing the cause of America held up in America by soreign arms. The discon—"tents of the troops have been gradually nur—"tured to a dangerous extremity. Something

"fatisfactory must be done, or the army must cease to exist at the end of the campaign; or it will

"to exist at the end of the campaign; or it will exhibit an example of more virtue, fortitude,

" felf-denial, and perfeverance, than has perhaps

"ever been paralleled in the history of human

" enthusiasm."

While thus impressed with these apprehensions of the depreciation of public virtue, general Washington had to balance the parties, and to meliorate the distresses of the inhabitants, alternately ravaged by all descriptions of soldiers, in the vicinity of both armies. It was impossible for him to strike any capital blow, without money even for daily expenses, without a naval force sufficient to cover any exertions; his battalions incomplete, his army clamorous and discontented, and on the point of mutiny, from the desciencies in their pay, and the immediate want of every necessary of life.

At the fame time, the legislatures of the several states were in the utmost anxiety, to devise ways and means to supply the requisitions of congress, who had recently laid a tax of many millions on the states, in order to sink the enormous quantity of old paper money. The calls of an army, naked, hungry, and turbulent, even to the discovery of symptoms of revolt, were indeed alarming. The pressing necessities of the army, and the critical exigencies of the times, crowded upon them in every department, and required the utmost wisdom, vigilance, and fortitude.

Nothing depictures the characters, the fentiments, and the feelings of men, more strongly than their private letters at the time. Perhaps this may be evinced, by giving the reader a paragraph of a letter from the speaker* of the house of representatives of Massachusetts, to a private friend, at this critical æra of embarrassement and perplexity.

"Our public affairs wear a most disagreeable "aspect. Embarrassments increase from every "quarter. My contemplations are engroffed by "day and by night, for the falvation of my "country. If we fucceed, I shall have pleasure "which a fortune cannot give: if we fail, I " fhall feel confolations that those who are in-"tent only on making fortunes, must envy. In "a country abounding with men and provi-"fions, it would torture a Sully to raife and "fupport an army in the field. Every thing is "refolved into money: but the great question "is, how to get it?-Taxes, though fo great, "and often repeated, do not bring it in fast "enough; we cannot borrow, because no one "will lend: while the army is in danger of "flarving or difbanding. If we lay more taxes, "the very people who have been used to tender "the one half of their property, or even their "all, for the fervice of their country, will now "revolt at the idea of paying a two-hundredth "part; and it might perhaps create uneafinefs "that might break the union. On the other "hand, if we do not lay more taxes, for aught "I fee, there must be an end of the contest. "All these difficulties are increased by the suc-" ceffes of the enemy, which clog our measures "by dispiriting the army and the people. But "I do not despair. One vigorous and grand "campaign may yet put a glorious period to "the war. All depends on proper exertions. "We have to choose glory, honor, and happi-"nefs, or infamy, difgrace, and mifery."

The complicated difficulties already depictured, clearly prove, that fuch a spirit of avarice and peculation had crept into the public departments, and taken deep hold of the majority of the people, as Americans a few years before, were thought incapable of. The careful observer of human conduct will readily perceive, that a variety of concurring causes led to this studden change of character. The opulent, who had been used to ease, independence, and generosity, were reduced, dispirited, and deprived of the ability of rendering pecuniary service to their country, by the unavoidable failure of public faith. Great part of the fortunes of the widow, the orphan, and the aged, were funk in the public funds; fo that the nominal income of a year, would fcarcely fupply the necessities of a day.

The depreciation of paper had been fo rapid, that at this time,* one hundred and twenty dollars of the paper currency was not an equivalent to one in filver or gold: while at the fame time, a fudden accumulation of property by privateering, by fpeculation, by accident, or fraud, placed many in the lap of affluence, who were without principle, education, or family. These, from a thoughtless ignorance, and the novelty of splendor to which they had been total strangers, suddenly plunged into every kind of dissipation, and grafted the extravagancies and follies of foreigners, on their own passion for squandering what by them had been so eafily acquired.

Thus, avarice without frugality, and profusion without taste, were indulged, and soon banished the simplicity and elegance that had formerly reigned: instead of which, there was spread in America among the rising generation, a thirst for the accumulation of wealth, unknown to their ancestors. A class who had not had the advantages of the best education, and who had paid little attention to the principles of the revolution, took the lead in manners. Sanctioned by the breach of public faith, the private obligations of justice feemed to be little regarded, and the facred idea of equity in private contracts was annihilated for a time, by the example of public deficiency.

The infantile state of government, the inexperience of its leaders, and the necessity of subflituting a medium with only an imaginary value, brought an impeachment on congress, without voluntary deviations from probity, or willing breaches of faith. Perhaps nothing is more true, than an observation of a member of that body, that "the necessity of affairs had often " obliged them to depart from the purity of their first "principles." The complaint that the fountain was corrupt, was artfully diffused: however that might be, the ftreams were undoubtedly tainted, and contamination, with few exceptions, feemed to run through the whole body of the people; and a declenfion of morals was equally rapid with the depreciation of their currency.

But a fuperintending Providence, that overrules the defigns, and defeats the projects of men, remarkably upheld the spirit of the Americans; and caused events that had for a time a very unfavorable aspect, to operate in favor of independence and peace, and to make a new na.1780.

But they had yet many difficulties to ftruggle with, which will be fufficiently evinced as we follow the route of the British army, and detail the transactions in the Carolinas. The embarrassiments and distresses, the battles, skirmishes, and disappointments, the alternate successes and defeats, slight and pursuit, that took place between the contending parties there, must be more copiously related, previous to the manœuvres through the state of Virginia, that led to the last capital stroke, which sinished with glory and renown the grand contest between Great Britain and her colonies, and sealed the independence of America.

Indeed a confiderable time had elapfed, before the diffresses of the country; the situation of the army, naked, hungry, and clamorous; the pressing importunity of general Washington; the addresses and declarations of congress; and the remonstrances of the several legislative bodies, could arouse from the pursuit of private interest, those who thought themselves secure from immediate danger.

Though from many untoward circumstances, a cloud for a time had seemed to hover over the minds of many, the people again awaked, both from the dream of secure enjoyment in fome, and the dread apprehensions in others of falling under the British yoke. The patriotic exertions and unshaken sirmness of the few in every state, again had their influence on the many, and all seemed ready to suffer any thing, but a subjugation to the crown of Britain.

Not the lofs of Charleston, a captured army, the destruction of their marine, the finking ftate of their medium, the internal ravages of their country, and their fea-coast blazing under the fire of their enemies, had the smallest tendency to bend the Americans to a dereliction of their claim to independence. A confidence in their own good fortune, or rather in that Providence, whose fiat points out the rife and marks the boundaries of empire, supported the more thoughtful; while a conflitutional hardiness, warmed by enthusiam, and whetted by innumerable and recent injuries, still buoyed up the hopes of the foldier, the statesman, the legislator, and the people at large, even in the darkeft moments.

Immediately after the news reached congress, that general Lincoln had furrendered Charleston, and that himself and his army were prisoners to the British commander, the baron de Kalb, a brave and experienced Prussian officer, who had been some time in the American service, was ordered to Virginia, with sanguine hopes of checking the further progress of the British arms. Though the baron de Kalb was an officer of great military merit, his command at the fouthward was only temporary.

General Gates, the fuccessful conqueror in the northern, was vested with the chief command in the fouthern department. It was an appointment of great responsibility: this might be a reason, in addition to the great respect which this foreign nobleman had for general Gates, that led him to express in all his letters to his friends, the peculiar fatisfaction he felt on his arrival to take the chief command. An officer of his name and experience, at once emboldened the friends of their country, and intimidated the wavering and difaffected. The renowned foldier who had captured one proud British general and his army, was at that time, viewed with particular awe and respect by another.

Nor was it long before most of the British commanders were convinced of the delusory nature of those assurances they had received from the loyalists, that a general disgust to the authority of congress prevailed; that the defection, more particularly in North Carolina, was such, that the people were ready to renounce all American usurpations, as soon as the royal standard should be erected among them.

The baron de Kalb had been fent on earlier from head-quarters: he had with him a detachment of fourteen hundred men. He stayed only a few weeks in Virginia, and moved from thence to Carolina, where he soon after met general Gates. After the junction of general Gates and the baron de Kalb, they, with unexampled patience and satigue, marched an army of several thousand men through a barren country, that afforded no subsistence except green fruits, and other unwholesome aliments. They reached the borders of South Carolina, and encamped at Clermont the thirteenth of August.

On his arrival in the vicinity of the British head-quarters, general Gates published a proclamation, inviting the patriotic inhabitants of South Carolina, "to join heartily in rescuing "themselves and their country, from the op-"pression of a government imposed on them by the russian hand of power." In this proclamation he promised forgiveness and perfect security, to such of the unfortunate citizens of the state, as had been induced by the terror of sanguinary punishments, and the arbitrary measures of military domination, apparently to acquiesce under the British government.

CHAP. XVII.

He observed, "that they had been obliged to make a forced declaration of allegiance and fupport to a tyranny, which the indignant fouls of citizens resolved on freedom, inward- ty revolted at with horror and detestation: that they might rest satisfied, that the genutine motive which has given energy to the present exertions, is the hope of rescuing them from the iron rod of oppression, and restroing to them those blessings of freedom and independence, which it is the duty and intermest of the citizens of these United States, jointly and reciprocally to support and confirm."

The fituation of general Gates at Clermont was not very advantageous, but his defign was not to continue long there, but by a fudden move to fall unexpectedly on lord Rawdon, who had fixed his head-quarters at Camden. This place was about thirteen miles diftant from Clermont, on the borders of the river Santee, from whence the communication was eafy to the internal parts of the country.

Lord Cornwallis had gained early intelligence of the movements of the American army, and had arrived at Camden himself, with a similar design, by an unexpected blow, to surprise general Gates and defeat his arrangements. His lordship effected his purpose with a facility beyond his own expectations. The two armies met in the night of the lifteenth of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty. Mutually surprised by the sudden necessity of action, a loose skirmish was kept up until the morning, when a general engagement commenced.

wal dayle of their will The British troops were not equal in numbers to those of the Americans, including the militia, while the renowned character of general Gates heightened the ideas of their strength. But the onfet on both fides began with equal fpirit and bravery, and was continued with valor equally honorary to both parties, until the militia intimidated, particularly those from Virginia and North Carolina, gave ground, threw down their arms, and fled with great precipitation. The order of the army was immediately broken, and fortune no longer favorable, forfook the American veteran, at the moment his reputation courted, and depended on her fmiles. His troops were totally routed, and the general himself fled, rather than retreated, in a manner that was thought for a time, in some measure to fully the laurels of Saratoga.

The baron de Kalb, an officer of great military talents and reputation, was mortally wounded in this action. He died rejoicing in the fervices he had rendered America in her noble ftruggles for liberty, and gloried with his CHAP. XVII.

last breath, in the honor of dying in defence of the rights of man. Before his death he dictated a letter to a friend, expressive of the warmest affection for the Americans, containing the highest encomiums on the valor of the continental troops, of which he had been so recent a witness, and declaring the satisfaction which he then selt, in having been a partaker of their fortune, and having fallen in their cause.*

The proportion of flain among the Americans, was much greater than that of the British. Brigadier general Gregory was killed, with several other brave officers: Rutherford and others were wounded and captured. The total rout of the Americans was completed, by the pursuit and destruction of a corps at some distance from the scene of the late action, commanded by colonel Sumpter. He was advancing with a strong body to the aid of general Gates, but meeting the news of his deseat, he endeavoured to retreat, and being unfortunately overtaken by colonel Tarleton, his whole party was dispersed or cut off.

^{*} When lord Cornwallis was informed of the rank and merits of the baron de Kalb, he directed that his remains should be respectfully interred. He was buried near the village of Camden; but no memorial of the deposite of this distinguished hero has been preserved, though congress some time afterwards directed a monument should be erected to his memory. Nothing was however done, except planting an ornamental tree at the head of his grave.

Censure for a time fell very heavily on general Gates, for the precipitation and distance of his retreat. He scarcely halted until he reached Hillfborough, an hundred miles from the field of battle. Yet neither the courage nor the fidelity of the bold and long-tried veteran could be called in question: the strongest human fortitude has frequently fuffered a momentary eclipse from that panic-struck influence, under which the mind of man fometimes unaccountably falls, when there is no real or obvious cause of despair. This has been exemplified in the greatest military characters; the duke of Parma* and others; and even the celebrated royal hero of Prussia has retreated before them as in a fright, but recovered himself, defied and conquered his enemies.

General Gates, though he had loft the day in the unfortunate action at Camden, loft no part of his courage, vigilance, or firmness. After he reached Hillsborough, he made several efforts to collect a force sufficient again to meet lord Cornwallis in the field: but the public opinion bore hard upon his reputation: he was immediately superseded, and a court-martial appointed to inquire into his conduct. He was indeed fully justified by the result of this military investigation, and treated with the utmost respect by the army, and by the inhabitants on his return to Virginia. Yet the tide of fame ebbed fast before him: but the impression made by his valor and military glory could never be erased.

^{*} The masterly retreat of the duke of Parma before the king of France, was indeed a hasty slight; but he soon recovered himself, and asked the king by a trumpet, "what "he thought of his retreat?" The king was so much out of humor, that he could not help saying, "he had no "skill in retreating; and that in his opinion, the best re-

The most exalted minds may, however, be clouded by misfortunes. Chagrined by his defeat, and the consequences attending it, the climax of his affliction was completed by the death of an amiable wife, and the loss of his only son, a very hopeful youth, who died about the same time. This honest republican, whose determined spirit, uncorruptible integrity, and military merits, had been so eminently useful to America in many critical emergencies, retired to Traveller's Rest, his seat in Virginia, where he continued until the temporary prejudice against him had subsided, when he again resumed his rank in the army.

After a little time had diffipated the fudden impression made by his ill success and retreat, it was allowed by almost every one, that general Gates was not treated by congress with all the delicacy, or indeed gratitude, that was due to an officer of his acknowledged merit. He however received the orders for superfedure and suspension, and resigned the command to general Greene with becoming dignity.

With a generofity and candor characteristic of himself, general Greene, who succeeded in the southern command, on all occasions vindicated the reputation of general Gates, who was fully restored to the good opinion of his countrymen; and continued to act an honorable part till the conclusion of the war. General Greene invariably afferted, that if there was any mistake in the conduct of Gates, it was in hazarding an action at all against such such success, not in his retreating after the battle was irretrievably lost. There was a large class, who from various motives, after the missortunes of general Gates, endeavoured to vilify his name, and detract from his character.

It may be observed in this, as in innumerable instances in the life of man, that virtue and talents do not always hold their rank in the public esteem. Malice, intrigue, envy, and other adventitious circumstances, frequently cast a shade over the most meritorious characters; and fortune, more than real worth, not seldom establishes the reputation of her favorites, in the opinion of the undiscerning multitude, and hands them down to posterity with laurels on their brow, which perhaps they never earned, while characters of more intrinsic excellence, are vilified or forgotten. General Gates however, had the consolation at all times to reflect on the just and universal plaudits he received, for the glorious termination of his northern campaign, and the many advantages which accrued to America, from the complete conquest of such a formidable body of her foes.

Lord Cornwallis did not reap all the advantages he had expected from his victory at Camden. His feverity did not aid his defigns, though he fanctioned by proclamations the most fummary executions of the unhappy fufferers, who had by compulsion borne arms in the British service, and were afterwards found enlisted under the banners of their country, in opposition to royal authority. Many of this description fuffered immediate death, in confequence of the order of the commander in chief, while their houses were burned, and their families obliged to fly naked to the wilderness to feek some miserable shelter. Indeed little less severity could have been expected, from circumstances not favorable to the character of a Britifh nobleman.

Whether stimulated by resentment, aroused by fear, or prompted by a wish to depopulate a country they despaired of conquering, is uncertain; it is true, however, that some of the British commanders when coming to action, observed in general orders, that they wanted no prisoners: and it was faid, that even lord Cornwallis had fometimes given the fame cruel intimation, to troops too much disposed to barbarity, without the countenance of their superiors.

CHAP. XVII.

The outrages of Tarleton and other British partifans, who cruelly and fuccefsfully ravaged the Carolinas, exemplified in too many inftances, that the account of this disposition is not exaggerated. Their licentiousness was for feveral weeks indulged, without any check to their wanton barbarities. But the people daily more and more alienated from the royal cause, by a feries of unthought of miseries, inflicted and fuffered in confequence of its fuccess; the inhabitants of the state of North Carolina, as well as of South Carolina and Georgia, and indeed the fettlers on the more distant borders, were, in a few weeks after the battle of Camden, every where in motion, to stop the progress of British depredation and power. For a time these fierce people were without connected fystem, regular discipline or subordination, and had fcarcely any knowledge of each other's defigns. Small parties collected under any officer who had the courage to lead them on, and many fuch they found, ready to facrifice every thing to the liberty they had enjoyed, and that independence they wished to maintain.

relistance and unceasing activity of the Americans, attack and defeat, surprise and escape, plunder, burning, and devastation, pervaded the whole country, when the aged, the helpless, the women, and the children, alternately fell the prey of opposite partisans. But the defeat of major Ferguson, a brave and favorite officer, early in autumn, was a blow that discovered at once the spirit of the people, and opened to lord Cornwallis the general disaffection of that part of the country, where he had been led to place the most considence.

Major Ferguson had for several weeks taken post in Tryon county, not far distant from the western mountains. He had there collected a body of royalists, who united with his regular detachments, spread terror and dismay through all the adjacent country. This aroused to action all who were capable of bearing arms, in opposition to his designs. A body of militia collected in and about the highlands of North Carolina: a party of Hunter's riflemen, a number of the steady yeomanry of the country, in short, a numerous and resolute band, in defiance of danger and fatigue, determined to drive him from his strong position on a spot called King's Mountain. Under various commanders who had little knowledge of each other, they feemed all to unite in the defign of hunting down this useful prop of British authority, in that part of the country.

These hardy partisans effected their purpose; CHAP. Major Ferguson, with an hundred and fifty of his men, fell in the action, and feven hundred were made prisoners, from whom were selected a few, who, from motives of public zeal or private revenge, were immediately executed. Perhaps the local fituation of the huntsman or favage, may leffen their horror at the fight of blood, where streams are continually pouring down before them, from the gasping victim slain by their own hands; and this may lead them, with fewer marks of compassion to immolate their own species, when either interest or refentment stimulates. In addition to this, all compassionate sensations might be totally deadened by the example of the British, who feemed to estimate the life of a man, on the fame grade with that of the animal of the forest.

The order for executing ten of the prisoners* immediately on their capture, was directed, as previously threatened, by a colonel Cleveland, who with Williams, Sevier, Shelby, and Campbell, were the principal officers who formed and conducted the enterprise against Ferguson.

After this victory, most of the adherents to the royal cause in the interior parts of the Carolinas, either changed sides or sunk into obscurity. Lord Cornwallis himself, in a letter to fir Henry Clinton about this time, complained, that "it was in the militia of the northern "frontier alone, that he could place the smallest dependence; and that they were so totally "dispirited by Ferguson's defeat, that in the "whole district he could not affemble an hun-"dred men, and even in them he could not now place the smallest considence."

- * This step was justly complained of in a letter to general Smallwood from lord Cornwallis. He particularly regretted the death of a colonel Mills, a gentleman of a fair and uniform character; also a captain Oates, and others, who were charged with no crime but that of royalism.
- + Sir Henry Clinton observed on this occasion, that "the fatal catastrophe of Ferguson's defeat, had lost lord
- "Cornwallis the whole militia of Ninety-Six, amounting to four thousand men; and even threw South Carolina in-
- "to a state of confusion and rebellion."

There had been repeated affurances given by the loyalists in North Carolina, that their numbers and their zeal would facilitate the restoration of his majesty's government in that province; but it appears by many circumstances, that these promises were considered as very sutile, in the opinion of several of the principal officers of the British army, as well as to the chief commander.

Soon after the affair with Ferguson, lord Cornwallis's health was fo far impaired, that he directed lord Rawdon to make communications to fir Henry Clinton, and to give him a full flatement of the perplexed and perilous fituation of his majesty's forces in the Carolinas. After stating many circumstances of the deception of the loyalists, the difficulty of obtaining fubfistence in fuch a barren country, and other particulars of their fituation, lord Rawdon observed in his letter to general Clinton, that they were greatly furprifed that no information had been given them of the advance of general Gates's army; and "no less grieved, "that no information whatever of its move-"ments, was conveyed to us by perfons fo " deeply interested in the event, as the North "Carolina loyalists."

After the defeat of general Gates, and the dispersion of his army, the loyalists were informed, that the moment had arrived when they ought immediately to stand forth, and "exert "themselves to prevent the re-union of the " fcattered enemy. Inftant fupport was in that "case promised them. Not a single man how-"ever, attempted to improve the favorable op-"portunity, or obeyed that fummons for which "they had before been fo impatient. It was "hoped that our approach might get the better " of their timidity: yet, during a long period, "whilft we were waiting at Charlotteburgh for "our stores and convalescents, they did not even furnish us with the least information re-"fpecting the force collecting against us. In " fhort, fir, we may have a powerful body of "friends in North Carolina, and indeed we "have cause to be convinced, that many of the "inhabitants wish well to his majesty's arms; "but they have not given evidence enough, "either of their numbers or their activity, to " justify the stake of this province, for the uncertain " advantages that might attend immediate junction " with them. There is reason to believe, that " fuch must have been the risk."

"Whilft this army lay at Charlotteburgh, "Georgetown was taken from the militia by
"the rebels; and the whole country to the east "of the Santee, gave fuch proofs of general de"fection, that even the militia of the High-Hills
"could not be prevailed upon to join a party

While lord Cornwallis lay ill of a fever, lord Rawdon wrote to major general Leslie, in terms of disappointment and despondence. He obferved, "that events had unfortunately taken "place very different from expectation: that "the first rumor of an advancing army under "general Gates, had unveiled a spirit of disaf-" fection, of which they could have formed no "idea; and even the dispersion of that force " did not extinguish the ferment which the "hope of its fupport had raifed. This hour, "the majority of the inhabitants of that tract "between the Pedee and the Santee, are in "arms against us; and when we last heard "from Charleston, they were in possession of "Georgetown, from which they had dislodged 66 our militia."†

While lord Cornwallis was thus embarraffed and disappointed by various unsuccessful attempts, and the defeat of many of his military operations in the Carolinas this year, fir Henry Clinton made a diversion in the Chesapeake, in favor of his lordship's defigns. A body of about three thousand men was fent on, under the command of general Leflie. He was under the orders of lord Cornwallis; but not hearing from his lordship for some time after his arrival, he was totally at a loss in what manner to proceed. But some time in the month of October, he received letters from lord Cornwallis, directing him to repair with all possible expedition to Charleston, to affift with all his forces in the complete fubjugation of the Carolinas.

Sir Henry Clinton, from an idea that Cornwallis's prime object was the reduction of the Carolinas, and fenfible of the necessity, at the fame time, of folid operations in Virginia, paid all proper attention to the expedition into the Chefapeake. After general Leslie, in obedience to the orders of lord Cornwallis, had marched to the fouthward, the command of the armament in Virginia was given to general Arnold, who now acted under the orders of fir Henry Clinton. In consequence of his defection, he had been advanced to the rank of a brigadier general in the British army.

General Arnold had recently deferted the American cause, sold himself to the enemies of his country, and engaged in their service. He was a man without principle from the beginning; and before his desection was discovered, he had sunk a character raised by impetuous valor, and some occasional strokes of bravery, attended with success, without being the possessor of any intrinsic merit.

He had accumulated a fortune by great crimes, and fquandered it without reputation, long before he formed the plan to betray his country, and facrifice a cause disgraced by the appointment of a man like himself, to such important trusts. Proud of the trappings of office, and ambitious of an ostentatious display of wealth and greatness, (the certain mark of a narrow mind,) he had wasted the plunder acquired at Montreal, where his conduct had been remarkably reprehensible; and had dissipated the rich harvest of peculation he had reaped at Philadelphia, where his rapacity had no bounds.

Montreal he had plundered in hafte; but in Philadelphia, he fat himfelf down deliberately to feize every thing he could lay hands on in the city, to which he could affix an idea that it had been the property of the difaffected party, CHAP. XVII.

and converted it to his own use.* Not satisfied with the unjust accumulation of wealth, he had entered into contracts for speculating and privateering, and at the same time made exorbitant demands on congress, in compensation of public services. In the one he was disappointed by the common failure of such adventures; in the other he was rebussed and mortisted by the commissioners appointed to examine his accounts, who curtailed a great part of his demands as unjust, unfounded, and for which he deserved severe reprehension, instead of a liquidation of the accounts he had exhibited.

Involved by extravagance, and reproached by his creditors, his refentment wrought him up to a determination of revenge for public ignominy, at the expense of his country, and the facrifice of the small remains of reputation left, after the perpetration of so many crimes.

The command of the very important post at West Point, was vested in general Arnold. No one suspected, notwithstanding the censures which had fallen upon him, that he had a heart base enough treacherously to betray his military trust. Who made the first advances to negociation is uncertain; but it appeared on a fcrutiny, that Arnold had made overtures to general Clinton, characteristic of his own turpitude, and not very honorary to the British commander, if viewed abstractedly from the usages of war, which too frequently fanctions the blackest crimes, and enters into stipulations to justify the treason, while generosity despises the traitor, and revolts at the villany of the parricide. Thus his treacherous proposals were listened to, and fir Henry Clinton authorised major Andre, his adjutant general, a young gentleman of great integrity and worth, to hold a personal and secret conference with the guilty Arnold.

A British sloop of war had been stationed for some time, at a convenient place to facilitate the defign: it was also said, that Andre and Arnold had kept up a friendly correspondence on fome trivial matters, previous to their perfonal interview, which took place on the twenty-first of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty. Major Andre was landed in the night, on a beach without the military boundaries of either army. He there met Arnold, who communicated to him the state of the army and garrison at West Point, the number of men considered as necessary for its defence, a return of the ordnance, and the dispofition of the artillery corps in case of an attack or alarm. The accounts he gave in writing, with drafts of all the works. These papers

The conference continued fo long, that it did not finish timely for the safe retreat of major Andre. He was conducted, though without his knowledge or confent, within the American posts, where he was obliged to conceal himself in company with Arnold, until the enfuing morning. It was then found impracticable for Clinton's agent to make his escape by the way he had advanced. The Vulture floop of war, from whence he had been landed, had shifted her station while he was on shore, and lay so much exposed to the fire of the Americans, that the boatmen whom Arnold had bribed to bring his new friend to the conference, refused to venture a fecond time on board. This circumstance rendered it impossible for major Andre to return to New York by water; he was therefore impelled, by the advice of Arnold, to a circuitous route, as the only alternative to efcape the danger into which he was indifcreetly betrayed.

Thus was this young officer, whose former character undoubtedly rendered him worthy of a better fate, reduced to the necessity of hurrying as a disguised criminal, through the posts of his enemies, in fallacious hopes of again recovering the camp of his friends. In this painful state of mind, he had nearly reached the British, when he was suddenly arrested within the American lines, by three private soldiers. His reflections may be more easily imagined than described—taken in the night, detected in a disguised habit, under a sictitious name, with a plan of the works at West Point, the situation, the numbers, and the strength of the American army, with a pass under the hand of general Arnold in his pocket-book.

He urged for a few moments, the man who first seized his horse's bridle, to let him pass on; told him that his name was John Anderson; that his business was important; and that he could not be detained: but two other foldiers coming up, and in a peremptory manner faluting him as their prisoner, after challenging him as a fpy, he attempted no farther equivocation, but presented a purse of gold, an elegant watch, and offered other very tempting rewards, if he might be permitted to pass unmolested to New York. Generously rejecting all pecuniary rewards, the difinterested privates who seized the unfortunate Andre, had the fidelity to convey their prisoner as speedily as possible, to the head-quarters of the American army.

Such inftances of fidelity, and fuch contempt for private interest, when united with duty and obligation to the public, are so rare among the common classes of mankind, that the names of CHAP. XVII.

John Paulding, David Williams, and Ifaac Vanvert,* ought never to be forgotten. General Washington immediately informed congress of the whole business, and appointed a court-martial, consisting of the principal officers of the army, to inquire into the circumstances and criminality of this interesting affair.

The day after major Andre was taken, he wrote to general Washington with a frankness becoming a gentleman, and a man of honor and principle. He observed, that what he had as yet faid of himfelf, was in the justifiable attempt to extricate him from threatened danger; but that, too little accustomed to duplicity, he had not fucceeded. He intimated, that the temper of his mind was equal; and that no apprehensions of personal safety had induced him to address the commander in chief; but that it was to fecure himself from the imputation of having assumed a mean character, for treacherous purposes or self-interest, a conduct which he declared incompatible with the principles which had ever actuated him, as well as with his condition in former life.

In this letter he added:—"It is to vindicate "my fame that I fpeak; not to folicit fecurity. "The person in your possession, is major John

^{*} These were the names of the three soldiers who detected and secured major Andre.

"Andre, adjutant general to the British army." He then detailed the whole transaction, from his going up the Hudson in the Vulture sloop of war, until seized at Tarry-town, without his uniform, and, as himself expressed, "betrayed into the vile condition of an enemy within your posts." He requested his excellency that he might be treated as a man of honor; and urged, that "in any rigor policy might dictate, I pray that a decency of conduct towards me may mark, that though unfortunate, I am branded with nothing dishonorable, as no motive could be mine, but the service of my king; and that I was involuntarily an impostor."

After a thorough investigation, the result of the trial of major Andre, was an unanimous opinion of the court-martial, that his accufation was just. They reported, "that major Andre, "adjutant general to the British army, ought "to be confidered as a fpy from the enemy: "that he came on fhore from the Vulture floop "of war, in the night of the twenty-first of 66 September, on an interview with general Ar-"nold, in a private and fecret manner; that he "changed his drefs within our lines, and un-"der a feigned name, and in a difguised "habit, paffed our works at Stoney and Ver-"plank's Points; that he was taken in a dif-"guised habit on his way to New York; that "he had in his possession several papers, which "contained intelligence for the enemy; and "that agreeable to the laws and usages of na-"tions, it is their opinion he ought to suffer "death."*

Great interest was made in favor of this young gentleman, whose life had been unimpeached, and whose character promised a distinguished rank in society, both as a man of letters and a soldier. He was elegant in person, amiable in manners, polite, sensible, and brave: but from a misguided zeal for the service of his king, he descended to an assumed and disgraceful character; and by accident and mistake in himself, and the indiscretion and baseness of his untried friend, he sound himself ranked with a class held infamous among all civilized nations.

The character of a fpy has ever been held mean and difgraceful by all classes of men: yet the most celebrated commanders of all nations, have frequently employed some of their bravest and most considential officers to wear a guise, in which if detected, they are at once subjected to infamy and to the halter. Doubtless, the generals Clinton and Washington were equally culpable, in selecting an Andre and a Hale to hazard all the hopes of youth and talents, on the precarious die of executing with fuccess, a CHAP. XVII. business to which so much deception and baseness is attached.

But the fate of Andre was lamented by the enemies of his nation: his fufferings were foothed by the politeness and generosity of the commander in chief, and the officers of the American army. The gloom of imprisonment was cheered in part, and the terrors of death mitigated, by the friendly intercourse and converse of benevolent minds; and the tear of compassion was drawn from every pitying eye, that beheld this accomplished youth a victim to the usages of war. While the unfortunate Hale, detected in the effort of gaining intelligence of the defigns of the enemies of his country, in the same clandestine manner, had been hanged in the city of New York, without a day lent to pause on the awful transition from time to eternity.*

This event took place foon after the action on Long Island. The dilemma to which he was reduced, and the fituation of his army, rendered it expedient for general Washington to endeavour to gain some intelligence of the defigns, and fubsequent operations of fir William Howe, and the army under his command. This. being intimated by colonel Smallwood to captain Hale, a young gentleman of unimpeachable character and rifing hopes, he generously offered to risk his life for the service of his country, in the perilous experiment. He ventured into the city, was detected, and with the same frankness and liberality of mind that marked the character of Andre, acknowledged that he was employed in a business that could not be forgiven by his enemies; and, without the smallest trait of compassion from any one, he was cruelly infulted, and executed with difgraceful rigor. Nor was he permitted to bid a melancholy adieu to his friends, by conveying letters to inform them of the fatal catastrophe, that prematurely robbed them of a beloved fon.

The lives of two fuch valuable young officers, thus cut off in the morning of expectation, were fimilar in every thing but the treatment they received from the hands of their enemies. The reader will draw the parallel, or the contrast, between the conduct of the British and the Americans, on an occasion that demanded equal humanity and tenderness from every beholder, and make his own comment.

A personal interview, at the request of sir Henry Clinton, took place between the generals Robertson and Greene; and every thing in the power of ingenuity, humanity, or affection, was proposed by general Robertson to prevent the fate of the unhappy Andre. It was urged that he went from the Vulture under the fanction of a flag; and that general Arnold had, as he had a right to do, admitted him within the American lines. But major Andre had too much fincerity to make use of any subterfuge not founded in truth: in the course of his examination, he with the utmost candor acknowledged, that "it "was impossible for him to suppose he came on " fhore under the fanction of a flag."

CHAP. XVII. 1780.

The propriety and dignity with which he had written to general Washington, on his first becoming a prisoner; the acknowledgment of his rank and condition in life, the manner of his detection, the accident of his being betrayed within the American posts; and indeed such was his whole deportment, that the feelings of humanity forbade a wish for the operation of the rigorous maxims of war.

It was thought necessary, that he should be adjudged the victim of policy; but refentment towards him was never harbored in any bosom. He gratefully acknowledged the kindness and civilities he received from the American officers; but he wished some amelioration of some part of his fentence: his fentibility was wounded by the manner in which he was doomed to die.

He wrote general Washington the day before his execution, that—"Buoyed above the terror "of death, by the consciousness of a life devo- ted to honorable pursuits, stained with no ac- tion that can give me remorfe, I trust that the request I make to your excellency at this fevere period, and which is to soften my last moments, will not be rejected."

"Sympathy towards a foldier, will furely in"duce you to adapt the mode of my death to
"the feelings of a man of honor."

"Let me hope, fir, that if aught in my character impresses you with esteem towards me; if aught in my misfortunes marks me the victim of policy, not of resentment; I shall experience the operation of those feelings in your breast, by being informed, I am not to die on a gibbet."

This his last and pathetic request, to die as a foldier and a man of honor, not as a criminal, the severity of military rules pronounced inadmissible; and this gallant and amiable young officer fell as a traitor, amidst the armies of America, but without a personal enemy: every tongue acceded to the justice of his sentence, yet every eye dropped a tear at the necessity of its execution. Many persons, from the impulse of humanity, thought that general Washington might, consistently with his character as a foldier and a patriot, have meliorated the fentence of death fo far, as to have faved, at his own earnest request, this amiable young man from the ignominy of a gallows, by permitting him to die in a mode more consonant to the ideas of the brave, the honorable, and the virtuous.

behalve of his flow strongers. When general Arnold was first apprifed of the detection of major Andre, and that he was conducted to head-quarters, he was ftruck with aftonishment and terror, and in the agitation and agonies of a mad man, he called for a horse, mounted instantly, and rode down a craggy steep, never before explored on horseback. He took a barge, and under a flag he paffed Verplank's Point, and foon found himfelf fafe beneath the guns of the Vulture floop of war. Before he took leave of the bargemen, he made them very generous offers if they would act as dishonorably as he had done: he promifed them higher and better wages, if they would defert their country and enlift in the fervice of Britain; but they fpurned at the offer, and were permitted to return. Perhaps, had these American watermen been apprifed of the full extent of Arnold's criminality, they would have acted with as much resolution as the trio who feized major Andre, and have fecured Arnold, when he might have fuffered the punishment he deserved.

After Arnold had got fafe to New York, he wrote to general Washington in behalf of his wife; endeavoured to justify his own conduct, and his appointment and conference with Andre; claimed his right to fend a flag to the enemy for any purposes he might think proper, while he held a respectable command in the American army; and urged the release of major Andre with art, infolence, and address. He did not stop here, but on the feventh of October, five days after the execution of Andre, he fent out an address to the people of America, fabricated under the auspices of his new masters. and couched in very infolent and overbearing language. He cast many indecent reflections on congress, on his countrymen, on the French nation, and on the alliance between America and France.

Soon after his arrival in New York, he received the price of his fidelity, ten thousand pounds sterling, in cash,—and of his honor, in a new commission under the crown of Great Britain.

The generals Clinton and Robertson did every thing to save the life of their favorite Andre, except delivering up the traitor Arnold. To this exchange, general Washington would readily have acceded; but a proposal of this nature could not be admitted; for, however beloved or esteemed the individual may be, per-fonal regards must yield to political exigencies. CHAP. XVII. Thus while the accomplished Andre was permitted to die by the hand of the common executioner, the infamous Arnold was careffed, rewarded, and promoted to high rank in the British army.

The American government was not remifs in all proper encouragement to fignal inflances of faithful attachment to the interest and service of their country. Congress ordered, that the three private foldiers who had rejected the offers of Andre on his detection, should each of them be prefented with a filver medal, two hundred dollars annually during life, and the thanks of congress, acknowledging the high fense they retained of the virtuous conduct of Paulding, Williams, and Vanvert.

Sir Henry Clinton had fo high an opinion of general Arnold's military abilities, and placed fuch entire confidence in this infamous traitor to his country, that he vested him with commands of high trust and importance; and for a time placed his fole dependence on him for the ravage of the borders of Virginia. He had now the fole command in the Chefapeake; and by his rapacity he was qualified to furprife and plunder: his talents for profecuting hostilities by unexpected attack and maffacre, were well known in both armies. But affairs in Virginia beginning to wear a more ferious aspect, general Clinton thought it not proper to leave general Arnold to his own discretion for any length of time, without the support and affistance of officers of more respectable character, who we shall see were appointed, and fent forward the beginning of the next year.

We leave the operations of the British commanders in their several departments, for the present, and again advert to some interesting circumstances, and new disappointments, that took place towards the close of the present year, and filled the mind of every true American with the utmost concern. There had yet been no treaty or public stipulations between the United States and any foreign nation, except France; but circumstances had been ripening to bring forward immediate negociations with the Dutch republic.

Holland was at this period in a more delicate fituation than almost any other European power. Great Britain claimed her as an ally, and held up the obligations of patronage and protection in strong language: but the nature of the dispute between Great Britain and her transatlantic domains, as well as the commercial views of the Belgian provinces, interested the merchants, the burgomasters, and the pensioners of Holland, in favor of America; while the partiality of the stadtholder, his family, and the court connexions, were altogether British; or at least, the motives of interest, affection, or fear, held them up in that light.

CHAP. XVII. 1780.

In the intermediate time, the clandestine affistance given by the Dutch merchants was very advantageous to America; and the private encouragement of some of the magistrates of the United Netherlands, that a treaty of alliance and the strictest amity might in time be accomplished between the two republics, heightened the expectations of the American congress. None of the principal characters among the Batavians, were more zealously interested in the fuccess of the American struggle for independence, than Robert Jasper Van der Capellen, lord of Marsch.

This worthy Dutchman, as early as the feventh of December, one thousand seven hundred and feventy-eight, had folicited a correspondence with feveral of the most prominent characters in America. A more correct and judicious correspondent he could not have selected, than governor Trumbull of Connecticut, whose merits as a man, a patriot, and a christian, cannot be too highly appreciated. This gentleman was diftinguished in each line of this triple character: as a man, his abilities were conspicuous, his comprehension clear, and his judgment correct. The fedateness of his mind qualified him for the patriot, and the friend of a young and growing country, whose manufactures had been checked, her commerce cramped, and their liberties (for the enjoyment of which they had fled to a distant world) curtailed; and in no instance did he ever deviate from the principles of the revolution. His uniform conduct as a christian, was not less signal; his integrity and uprightness, his benevolence and piety, and the purity and fimplicity of his manners, through a long life, approached as near the example of the primitive patterns of a fublime religion, as that of any one raised to eminence of office, who, by the flatteries of their fellow-men, are too often led to forget themselves, their country, and their God.

The baron Van der Capellen was a zealous supporter of the Americans in their claim to independence, and pre-disposed many of his countrymen to unite cordially with them, and enter into treaties of amity and commerce, previous to the arrival of a minister at the Hague, to negociate on that subject.

In one of his letters to governor Trumbull he had observed, "that among other causes of "distrust, in relation to the credit of America, "was the false intelligence which the English in-"cessantly circulate, the effects of which the friends "of the Americans cannot destroy, for the want of information: that it was of the last impor"tance to enable them by authentic relations, which should contain nothing but what was precisely true, and in which even the disadto vantages inseparable from the chances of war, should not be concealed; in order to enable them from time to time, to give an idea of the actual state of things, and of what is really passing on the other side of the ocean."

He added:- "If you choose, fir, to honor "me with fuch a correspondence, be affured "that I shall make a proper use of it. Com-"munications apparently in confidence, have a "much stronger influence than those which ap-"pear in public." He observed, that "a de-" fcription of the prefent state and advantages " of United America; of the forms of government in its different republics; of the facility with which strangers there may establish "themselves, and find a subsistence; of the " price of lands, both cultivated and unimprov-"ed, of cattle, provisions, &c.; with a fuccinct "history of the prefent war, and the cruelties " committed by the English,—would excite as-"tonishment in a country, where America is "known but through the medium of the ga-" zettes."

Governor Trumbull had not hefitated to comply with this request: he had detailed a fuccinct narrative of past and present circumstances, and the future prospects of America; for a part of which the reader is referred to the Appendix.* The baron Capellen observes on the above letter of this gentleman, that "it was "to be regretted that so handsome, so energetic "a defence of the American cause, should be "fhut up in the port-solio of an individual: "that he had communicated it with discretion "in Amsterdam; and that it had made a very "ftrong impression on all who had read it."

These favorable dispositions among many perfons of high consideration in the United Netherlands, whose ancestors had suffered so much to secure their own liberties, led congress to expect their aid and support, in a contest so interesting to republican opinion, and the general freedom of mankind. It forbade any farther delay in the councils of America. Congress were convinced no time was to be lost; but that a minister with proper credentials, should immediately appear in a public character at the Hague; or if that should be found inadmissible, that he should have instructions to regulate any private negociations, according to the dictates of judgment, discretion, or necessity.

Accordingly, early in the present year, the honorable Henry Laurens of South Carolina, late president of the continental congress, was vested with this important commission. Perhaps a more judicious choice of a public minister could not have been made throughout the states. From his prudence, probity, politeness, and knowledge of the world, Mr. Laurens was competent to the trust, and well qualified for the execution thereof: but he was unfortunately captured on his way by admiral Edwards, carried to Newfoundland, and from thence sent to England, where he experienced all the rigors of severity usually inflicted on state criminals.

Before Mr. Laurens left the foggy atmofphere of Newfoundland, an apparent instance of the deep-rooted jealousy harbored in the breasts of the British officers, against all Americans who fell into their hands, was discovered by the resusal of admiral Edwards to permit, at Mr. Laurens's request, Mr. Winslow Warren to accompany him to Europe, in the frigate in which he failed.

This youth was the fon of a gentleman who had been vested with some of the first and most respectable offices of trust and importance in America; he was captured on his way to Europe, a few weeks before Mr. Laurens, to whom he had introductory letters from some of the first characters in America, to be delivered on his arrival at the Hague: their unfortunate meeting as prisoners on this dreary spot, gave him an early opportunity to present them. No cartel had yet been settled for the exchange of prisoners; and sensibly touched with compassion for their sufferings, Mr. Warren voluntarily engaged to remain as an hostage till that arrangement might take place. The admiral consented to send a great number of Americans to Boston, on Mr. Warren's word of honor, that an equal number of British prisoners would be returned.

Mr. Laurens wished to anticipate his release, from the generous feelings of his own mind, as well as from the delicacy of sentiment and the accomplished manners of Mr. Warren; and though they were both treated with the utmost politeness by admiral Edwards, he refused to gratify these gentlemen in their mutual wishes to be fellow-passengers, as they were fellow-prisoners: but the admiral permitted Mr. Warren, within three or four days after Mr. Laurens's departure, to take passage in another frigate, bound directly to England.

Mr. Laurens took an affectionate leave of Mr. Warren, and requested him to write his friends, or to tell them if he reached America before him, that "though he was an old man, "who had recently lost all his estates in Charles" ton by the capture of that city, and had now "lost his liberty, that he was still the same; "firm, cheerful, and unruffled by the shocks of fortune."

When Mr. Laurens arrived in England, he was committed to the tower, confined to very narrow apartments, and denied all intercourse with his friends. There Mr. Warren saw him when he arrived in England, near enough to exchange a salute, but they were not permitted to speak to each other.

It is observable that the defection of general Arnold, and the capture of Mr. Laurens, took place within a few days of each other. These two circumstances operated on the passions of men in a contrasted point of view. The treachery of Arnold was beheld with irritation and difdain, by his former military affociates, and with the utmost difgust and abhorrence through all America. The fate of Mr. Laurens awakened the better feelings of the human heart. As an individual of the highest respectability, all who knew him were pained with apprehenfions, lest he should be subjected to personal danger or fufferings. As a diplomatic officer, the first public character that had been sent to the Batavian provinces, it was feared, his captivity and detention might have an unfavorable effect on the foreign relations of America, and particularly on their connexion with Holland. Indeed a variety of circumstances that took place through the fummer and autumn of this, did not augur the most propitious promifes, relative to the operations of the next year.

WE have already feen the double disappointment experienced by the United States, occafioned by the capture of one army in South Carolina under general Lincoln, and the defeat of another commanded by general Gates in North Carolina, who was fent forward with the highest expectations of retrieving affairs in that quarter.....We have feen the complicated embarraffments of the United States, relative to raising, paying, and supporting a permanent army.....We have feen the pernicious effects of a depreciating currency, and the beginning of a spirit of peculation and regard to private interest, that was not expected from the former habits and professions of Americans.....We have feen the disappointments and delay relative to foreign negociations.....We have feen both the patient fufferings of the American army under the greatest necessity, and the rising restlessness that foon pervaded nearly the whole body of the foldiery; and we have also seen the desertion of a general officer, in whom considence had been placed as a man of courage: we left Arnold stigmatized as a traitor, and in all the pride and insolence of a British general, newly vested with command in reward of villany, beginning under the British standard, his career of ravage and depredation in Virginia.

In addition to the alarming circumstances already recapitulated, at the close of the preceding year, the most dangerous symptoms were exhibited in the conduct of a part of the army, which broke out in revolt; and the secession of the whole Pennsylvania line spread a temporary dismay.

1781.

On the first of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one, upwards of a thousand men belonging to that line, marched in a body from the camp; others, equally disaffected, soon followed them. They took an advantageous ground, chose for their leader a serjeant major, a British deserter, and saluted him as their major general. On the third day of their revolt, a message was sent from the officers of the American camp: this they resuled to receive; but to a slag which followed, requesting to know their complaints and intentions, they replied, that "they had ferved three years;" that they had engaged to ferve no longer; "nor would they return, or difperfe, until their "grievances were redreffed, and their arrear-"ages paid."

General Wayne, who commanded the line, had been greatly beloved and respected by the soldiery, nor did he at first himself doubt, but that his influence would soon bring them back to their duty. He did every thing in the power of a spirited and judicious officer, to dissipate their murmurs, and to quiet their clamors, in the beginning of the insurrection: but many of them pointed their bayonets at his breast; told him to be on his guard; that they were determined to march to congress to obtain a redress of grievances; and that, though they respected him as an officer, and loved his person, yet, if he attempted to sire on them, "he was "a dead man."

Sir Henry Clinton foon gained intelligence of the confusion and danger into which the Americans were plunged. He improved the advantageous moment, and made the revolters every tempting offer, to increase and fix their defection. He sent several persons to offer, in his name, a pardon for all past offences, an immediate payment of their full demands on congress, and protection from the British government. He desired them to send proper persons to Amboy, to treat farther, and engaged that a body of British troops was ready for their efcort.*

How far the conduct of fir Henry Clinton is to be justified by the laws of war, we leave to the decision of military characters; but to the impartial spectator, though so often practifed by officers of consideration and name, it appears an underhand interference, beneath the character of a brave and generous commander, to stimulate by those secret methods, a discontented class of soldiers, to turn the points of their swords against their country and their former friends.

But the intrigues of the British officers, and the measures of their commander in chief, had not the smallest influence: the revolted line, though distaissied and disgusted, appeared to have no inclination to join the British army. They declared with one general voice, that was there an immediate necessity to call out the American forces, they would still sight under the orders of the congressional officers. Several British spies were detected, busily employed in endeavouring to increase the ferment, who were tried and executed with little ceremony.

The prudent conduct of the commander in chief, and the disposition which appeared in government to do justice to their troops, subdued the spirit of mutiny. A respectable committee was sent from congress to hear their complaints, and as far as possible to relieve their sufferings. Those whose term of enlistment was expired, were paid off and discharged; the reasonable demands of others satisfied; and a general pardon granted to the offenders, who returned cheerfully to their duty.

The discontented and mutinous spirit of the troops was not, however, entirely eradicated: the sources of disquietude in an army situated like the present, were too many to suppress at once. They were without pay, without clothing sufficient for the calls of nature; and not satisfied with the assurances of suture compensation, their murmurs were too general, and their complaints loud and pressing.

The contagion of the mutinous example of the Pennfylvania line, had fpread in fome degree its dangerous influence over other parts of the army: it operated more particularly on a part of the Jerfey troops, foon after the pacification of the diforderly Pennfylvania foldiers, though not with equal fuccefs and impunity to themfelves. They were unexpectedly furrounded by a detachment from the main body of the army, and ordered to parade without their arms: on discovering some reluctance to obey, colonel Sprout, of the Massachusetts division, was directed to advance with a party, and demand their compliance within five minutes. As their numbers were not sufficient for resistance, they submitted without opposition. A few of the principal leaders of the revolt, were tried by a court-martial and adjudged guilty: as a second general pardon, without any penal institutions, would have had a fatal effect on the army, two of them suffered death for their mutinous conduct.

This example of feverity put a period to every fymptom of open revolt, though not to the filent murmurs of the American army. They still felt heavily the immediate inconveniences of the deficiency of almost every article necesfary to life: they had little fubfiftence, and feldom any covering, except what was forced from the adjacent inhabitants by military power. These circumstances were aggravated by the little prospect there still appeared of filling their battalions, and eftablishing a permanent army. Every evil had been enhanced, and every pleasing anticipation darkened, by the general flagnation of paper money, previous to the absolute death of such a ruinous medium of intercourfe between man and man. It had created fuspicion and apprehension in every mind, and led every one reluctantly to part with their 1781, fpecie, before they knew the fate of a currency, agonizing in the last pangs of diffolution.

The fuccesses at the northward had indeed given a spring to expectation and action; but the gloomy appearances of affairs at the southward, the ineffective movements in the central states, and the perseverance of the king and parliament of Britain, in their measures against the colonies, notwithstanding their recent connexion with a potent foreign power, wrapt in the clouds of uncertainty, the final termination of the present conslict.

These were discouragements that in theory might be thought infurmountable: but American Independence was an object of too great magnitude, to sink under the temporary evils, or the adventitious circumstances of war.

That great fource of moral turpitude, the circulating paper, which had languished the last year until without sinew or nerve for any effective purpose, died of itself in the present, without any visible wound, except from the immense quantity counterfeited in New York, and elsewhere under British insluence. In a considential letter to lord George Germaine about this time, general Clinton observed, that "the experiments suggested by your lordship "have been tried; no affistances that could be "drawn from the power of gold, or the arts of

but ftill the currency, like the widow's cruife

It is true, indeed, that the currency answered most of the purposes of congress, for some time after the date of the letter from which the above extract is taken. When the paper ceased to circulate, no one mourned or seemed to feel its loss; nor was it succeeded by any stagnation of business, or derangement of order. Every one rejoiced at the annihilation of such a deceptive medium, in full hope that considence between neighbour and neighbour, which this had destroyed, would again be restored.

The immense heaps of paper trash, denominated money, which had been ushered into existence from necessity, were from equal necessity locked up in darkness, there to wait some renovating day to re-instamp some degree of value, on what had deceived many into an ideal opinion that they possessed property. It was not long after this paper intercourse ceased, before silver and gold appeared in circulation, sufficient for a medium of trade and other purposes of life. Much of it was brought from the hoarded bags of the miser, who had concealed it in vaults instead of lending it to his distressed countrymen; and much more of the precious metals were put into circulation, by the fums fent from Europe to support a British army in captivity, and for the pay of the fleets and troops of France, which were fent forward to the affishance of the Americans.

Notwithstanding all the baneful evils of a currency of only a nominal value, that sluctuates from day to day, it would have been impossible for the colonies to have carried on a war, in opposition to the power of Great Britain, without this paper substitute for real specie. They were not opulent, though a competence had generally followed their industry. There were few among themselves wealthy enough to loan money for public purposes: foreigners were long shy; and appeared evidently reluctant at the idea of depositing their monies in the hands of a government, with whom they had but recently commenced an acquaintance.

France indeed, after the declaration of independence, generously lent of her treasures, to support the claims of liberty and of the United States, against the strong hand of Britain; but Spain kept her singers on the strings of her purse, though as observed above, America had sent several agents to the court of Madrid, to solicit aid: nor was it until the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, that even Holland opened her's to any effective purpose, for the pecuniary calls that accumulated beneath the waste of war, in which their sister republic was involved.

A few observations on the eventful transactions which took place among the nations of Europe this year, may here be properly introduced, before a farther continuance of the narrative of the war. This is necessary to give a clearer idea of the connexion brought forward between America and several foreign nations, besides France and Spain, before the pride of Great Britain could condescend to acknowledge the independence of the United States.

Previous to lord Cornwallis's last campaign in America, most of the belligerent powers in Europe had stood aloof, in a posture of expectation, rather than immediate action, as waiting the events of time, to avail themselves of cooperation when convenient, with that side that might offer the greatest advantage, when weighed in the political scale by which the interest of all nations is generally balanced.

France had long fince acknowledged the independence of America; and the whole house of Bourbon now supported the claim of the United States, though there had yet been no direct treaty between America and Spain. Ithad been the general expectation for some time before it took place, that Spain would finally unite with France in support of the American cause. From this expectation, the Spaniards in South America had prepared themselves for a rupture, a considerable time before any formal declaration of war had taken place, between the courts of Madrid and St. James. They were in readiness to take the earliest advantage of such an event. They had accordingly seized Pensacola in West Florida, and several British posts on the Mississippi, before the troops stationed there had any intimation that hostilities were denounced in the usual style, between the crowns of England and Spain.

Don Bernard de Galvez, governor of Louisiana, had proclaimed the independence of America at New Orleans, at the head of all the forces he could collect, as early as the nineteenth of August, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine, and had proceeded immediately to furprise and conquer wherever he could, the unguarded fettlements claimed by the crown of Britain. The British navy, generally masters of the ocean, had, early after hostilities commenced, beaten some of the Spanish ships, intercepted the convoys, and captured or destroyed feveral of the homeward bound fleets of merchantmen. But by the time we are upon, the arms of Spain had been fuccessful in feveral enterprises by sea: at the Bay of Honduras and in the West Indies, they also soon after gained feveral other advantages of some moment.

Don Bernard de Galvez had concerted a plan with the governor of the Havannah, to furprife Mobille. He encountered ftorms, dangers, difappointments, and difficulties, almost innumerble. This enterprising Spaniard recovered however, in some measure, his losses; and receiving a reinforcement from the Havannah, with a part of the regiment of Navarre, and some other auxiliaries, he repaired to, and landed near Mobille. He summoned the garrison to surrender, who, after a short defence, hung out a white slag, and a capitulation took place, by which the English garrison surrendered themselves prisoners of war.

In Europe, the war had been opened on the fide of Spain, by the fiege of Gibraltar. This strong fortress had been closely invested by a powerful fleet and army, for some time. The piratical states of Barbary, who, to the disgrace of Europe, were permitted to war upon, or to make tributary all the nations, had been recently disgusted with Great Britain; and such a defection had taken place, that no relief could be expected from that quarter, or any supplies of provisions obtained from them for the garrison, which was reduced to such distress, that they were several weeks without bread, except a few worm-eaten biscuits, sold at an enormous price: a guinea was refused for a calf's head, a chicken fold for nine shillings sterling, and every thing else proportionably scarce and dear; until the hardy British veterans sound they could subsist on the scanty allowance of a jill or two of rice per day.

But by the unexampled intrepidity of general Elliot, and the equal bravery of Boyd, the fecond in command; by the courage and perfeverance of many galiant British officers, and the spirit and constitutional valor of their troops, the garrison was enabled to resist, and to hold out amidst the distresses of famine, and against the most tremendous attack and bombardment that perhaps ever took place. A prodigious number of cannon of the heaviest size, and a vast apparatus of mortars, at once spouted their torrents of sire and brimstone on that barren rock. With equal horror and sublimity, the blaze was poured back by the besieged, with little intermission.

The fheets of flame were spread over the adjacent seas and the shipping for three or four weeks; when the magnanimous officers in the garrison, who had been for four days together without provisions of any kind, except a few kernels of rice, and a small quantity of mouldy bread, were relieved by the arrival of admiral Rodney, on his way to the West Indies. He was acompanied by a British sleet under the command of admiral Digby, who continued CHAP. XVIII. there with a number of ships sufficient for defence, and for the fecurity of a large number of Spanish prizes taken by admiral Rodney. He had fallen in with a fleet of eleven heavy ships of the line, commanded by don Juan Langara, who, after being dangerously wounded, and his ship reduced to a wreck, yielded to the superiority of the British flag, as did the San Julien, commanded by the marquis Modena, and indeed nearly the whole of the Spanish fleet.

Notwithstanding the reduction of Gibraltar was fuspended, we shall see the object was not relinquished. More formidable exertions were made the next year by the combined forces of France and Spain, for the completion of this favorite project.

It was indeed fome time after the accession of Spain, before any other European power explicitly acknowledged the independence of the United States: but Mr. Izard, who was fent to Tufcany, and Mr. William Lee to the court of Vienna, in one thousand seven hundred and feventy-eight, inspired with that lively affurance which is fometimes the pledge of fuccefs, had met with no discouraging circumstances.

Holland had a still more difficult part to act, than France, Spain, or perhaps any other European power, who actually had adhered to, or appeared inclined to favor, the cause of America. Her embarrassiments arose in part from existing treaties with Great Britain, by which the latter claimed the Dutch republic as their ally, reproached her with ingratitude, and intimated that by former engagements, that republic was bound in all cases, to act offensively and defensively with the court of Great Britain. Thus the measures of the Batavian provinces were long impeded, by the intrigues of the British minister and the English faction at the Hague, before their high mightinesses acceded to the acknowledgment of American independence.

We have feen above, that the friendly dispofition of the Batavians towards America was fuch, in the particular fituation of both republics, as to render it at once rational and expedient, for the American congress to send a public minister to reside at the Hague. Mr. Laurens, as already related, was appointed, fent forward, captured on his way, and detained for fome time at Newfoundland. The unfortunate capture of the American envoy, prevented for a time all public negociations with Holland. He had been vested with discretionary powers, and had fuitable inftructions given him, to enter into private contracts and negociations, as exigencies might offer, for the interest of his country, until events were ripened for his full admission as ambaffador from the United States of America.

Mr. Laurens was captured at fome leagues distance from Newfoundland. When he found his own fate was inevitable, he neglected no precaution to prevent the public papers in his possession, from falling into the hands of his enemies. The British commander knew not the rank of his prisoner, until the packages seasonably thrown overboard by Mr. Laurens, were recovered by a British sailor, who had the courage to plunge into the sea with so much celerity as to prevent them from sinking.

By these papers a full discovery was made, not only of the nature of Mr. Laurens's commission, but of the dispositions of the Batavians to aid the exertions beyond the Atlantic, for the liberties of mankind. Their own freedom was a prize for which their ancestors had struggled for more than seventy years, against the strong hand of despotism, before they obtained the independence of their country.

In Mr. Laurens's trunk, thus recovered, was found a plan of a treaty of alliance between the States of Holland and the United States of America; also, letters from the pensioner of Amsterdam, with many communications and letters from the principal gentlemen and merchants in that and many other cities in the Dutch provinces.

Admiral Edwards confidered the capture of Mr. Laurens as so important, that he immediately ordered a frigate to England for the conveyance of this gentleman, and the evidences of the commission on which he had been sent out. These important papers received in England, sir Joseph Yorke, the British minister resident at the Hague, was directed by the king his master, to lay the whole of these transactions before their high mightinesses the statesgeneral of the United Provinces.

The British minister complained loudly, and in terms of high refentment, of the injuries and infults offered to Great Britain, by the ungrateful conduct of the republic of Holland. He urged, that fecretly fupplying the rebellious colonies with the accourrements for war, was a step not to be forgiven: that what had been fufpected before, now appeared clearly; and that he had the evidences in his hand, and the names of the principal conspirators: that the Belgic provinces were countenancing public negociations, and on the point of executing treaties of amity and commerce with the revolted Americans. He informed the states-general, that the king of England demanded prompt fatisfaction for these offences: that as a proof of their disavowal of these measures, he required immediate and exemplary punishment to be inflicted on the penfioner Van Berkel, and his accomplices, as diffurbers of the public peace, and vi- CHAR XVIII. olaters of the law of nations.

Notwithstanding the resentment of the British envoy, the conduct of the Dutch court remained for some time so equivocal, that neither Great Britain or America was fully fatisfied with their determinations. It is true, a treaty with the United States was for some time postponed; but the answer of their high mightinesses to the memorial and remonstrances of fir Joseph Yorke, not being sufficiently condescending and decided, his difgust daily increased. He informed his court in very difadvantageous terms, of the effect of his repeated memorials, of the conduct of their high mightinesses, and of that of the principal characters of the Batavian provinces at large.

Great Britain foon after, in the recess of parliament, amidst all her other difficulties, at war with France, Spain, and America, and left alone by all the other powers of Europe, to decide her own quarrels, announced hostilities against the Netherlands; and a long manifesto from the king was fent abroad in the latter part of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty.

A declaration of war against the republic of Holland, by the king of Great Britain, was very ehap. XVIII.

unpleafing to most of the northern powers. The baron Nolken, the Swedish ambassador resident at the court of London, remonstrated against it in a state paper, in which he observed, "that the flame of war, kindled in another "hemisphere, had communicated to Europe; " but the king of Sweden still slattered himself, "that this conflagration would not extend be-"yond its first bounds; and particularly that a "nation entirely commercial, which had made "neutrality the invariable foundation of its con-"duct, would not have been enveloped in it: "and yet, nevertheless, this has happened, al-" most in the very moment when that power "had entered into the most inoffensive engage-"ments, with the king and his two northern " allies. The same design and the same and t

"If the most exact impartiality that was ever befored, could not exempt the king from immediately feeling the inconveniences of war, by the considerable losses sustained by his commercial subjects, he had much greater reason to apprehend the consequences, when those troubles were going to be extended; when an open war between Great Britain and the republic of Holland multiplied them; and to conclude, when neutral commerce was about to endure new shackles, by the hostilities committed between those two powers." He added:—"The king could not but wish since cerely, that the measures taken by the empress " of Russia, for extinguishing this new war in CHAP. XVIII. "its beginning, might be crowned with the "most perfect fuccess."

But, indifferent to the remonstrances and memorials of the potentates of Europe, Great Britain, hostile, wealthy, powerful, and proud, appeared regardless of their resentment, and ready to bid defiance, and spread the waste of war among all nations.

The capture of Mr. Laurens was however no fmall embarraffment to the British ministry. Their pride would not fuffer them to recognife his public character; they dared not condemn him as a rebel; the independence of America was too far advanced, and there were too many captured noblemen and officers in the United States to think of fuch a step, lest immediate retaliation should be made; and his business was found too confequential to admit of his release. He was confined in the tower, forbidden the use of pen, ink, and paper, and all focial intercourse with any one; and was even interdicted any converse with a young son, who had been feveral years in England for his education.

There he fuffered a long imprisonment at his own expense, until many months had elapsed, and many unexpected events had taken place, that made it expedient to offer him his liberty without any equivalent. This he refused to accept, from the feelings of honor, as congress at that time, had offered general Burgoyne in exchange for Mr. Laurens.

The integrity of Mr. Laurens could not be warped either by flatteries or menaces, though his health was much impaired by his fevere and incommodious confinement. It was intimated to him at a certain period of his imprisonment, that it might operate in his favor, if he would advise his fon, colonel John Laurens, to withdraw himself from the court of France, where he was then executing with success, a commission from congress to negociate a loan of money, and solicit farther aid both by sea and land, in behalf of the American States.

The firmness of Mr. Laurens was not shaken by the proposal. He replied with equal considence, both in the affection of his son and the delicacy of his honor. He observed, that "fuch "was the filial regard of his son, that he knew he would not hesitate to forfeit his life for his stather; but that no consideration would insuce colonel Laurens to relinquish his honor, even were it possible for any circumstance to prevail on his father to make the improper request."

Immediately after the news of Mr. Laurens's capture, imprisonment, and detention in England, the American congress directed John Adams, esquire, who had a second time been CHAP, XVIII. fent to Europe in a public character, to leave France and repair to Holland, there to transact affairs with the states-general, which had before been entrusted to the fidelity of Mr. Laurens. Mr. Adams's commission was enlarged: from a confidence in his talents and integrity, he was vested with ample powers for negociation, for the forming treaties of alliance, commerce, or the loan of monies, for the United States of America. Not fettered by instructions, we fhall fee he exercifed his discretionary powers with judgment and ability.

Thus in strict amity with France and Spain, on the point of a treaty of alliance with the Batavian republic, Sweden and Denmark balancing, and nearly determined on a connexion with America, her foreign relations in general wore a very favorable aspect.

The empress of Russia only, among the European nations where an intercourse was opened, refused peremptorily to receive any minister at her court, under the authority of the congress of the United States of America. Overtures were made to the haughty fovereign of the Russian empire, early enough to evince the high confideration in which her arms and her character were viewed in America, as well as in Europe; but without the least shadow of fuccess. Determined to maintain her indepenCHAP, XVIII.

dent dignity, and hold the neutral position she had chosen, she did not even deign to see the person sent on by congress, to act as agent at the court of Petersburgh: but she concluded the business with the policy of the statesman, the address of her sex, and the superiority of the empress Catharine.

It was indeed doubted by many at the time, whether Mr. Dana was qualified to act as envoy at the court of Russia, and to negociate with such a potent state. He was undoubtedly a man of understanding, with a due share of professional knowledge, having been for several years an attorney of eminence. But it was thought that he had not either the address, the penetration, the knowledge of courts, or of the human character, necessary for a negociator at the court of a despotic semale, at the head of a nation of machines, under the absolute control of herself and her favorites.

It requires equanimity of temper, as well as true greatness of soul, to command or retain the respect of great statesmen and politicians. Distinguished talents and a pleasing address, were peculiarly necessary for a negociator at the court of Russia, both from the character of the nation and the monarch. The Russians were fanguine and revengeful, and ready by their precipitate counsels to aid their arbitrary mistress, in her bold designs and despotic mandates;

while she, as the dictatress of Europe, determin- CHAP. XVIII. ed the ruin of princes, and the annihilation of kingdoms.

On the earliest notice of an application from the congress of the United States, the empress, after feveral expressions of civility, containing a respectful regard to the interests of the American states, made all proper acknowledgments to them for the attention paid to herfelf. She had before granted them the free navigation of the Baltic, in spite of the remonstrances of the British minister resident at Petersburgh, against it.

She, however, ordered her minister to inform the American envoy, that "as mediatrix with "the emperor of Germany and the king of "Prussia, relative to the disputes subsisting be-"tween France, Spain, and Great Britain, she "thought it improper for her to acknowledge "the independence of America, until the refult "of the mediation was known; because the "provisional articles depended on the definitive "treaty." That "when the latter was com-"pleted, she should be ready to proceed in the "business: but that it would be highly im-"proper for her to treat with America as an "independent state, by virtue of powers or cre-"dentials iffued previous to the acknowledg-" ment of American independence, by the king " of Great Britain." That "her delicacy was CHAP. XVIII.

"a law to her, not to take before that time, a "ftep which might not be confidered as corref"ponding with those which have characterised "her strict neutrality, during the course of the "late war: notwithstanding which, the empress
"repeats, that you may enjoy, not only for "your own honor, but also for your country"men, who may come into her empire on com"mercial business, or otherwise, the most favor"able reception, and the protection of the laws "of nations."

This declaration placed the American agent in a very unpleasant predicament: totally at a loss what further steps to take, not able to obtain even an audience of the empress, he soon after returned to America.*

The failure of this negociation might not be entirely owing to a want of diplomatic skill or experience in the agent employed at the court of Russia. Though the choice of the congressional minister was perhaps, not so judicious as it might have been, many concurring circumstances prevented his success. The intrigues of Britain, the arts of France, and the profound CHAP. It was also fuggested, that the double-dealings of some Americans of confideration, had their weight in fruftrating the negociation, and preventing a treaty between one of the most distinguished and influential powers in Europe, and the United States of America.

The above is a fummary sketch of the views, the dispositions, and connexions, of the most important European powers, while the manœuvres in Virginia and the other fouthern states, were ripening events which brought forward accommodations, that not long after terminated in a general pacification, among the nations at The narration of naval transactions, connected with or influential on American affairs, both in the West Indies and in the European feas, is postponed to a subsequent part of this work; while we proceed to some further detail of military operations by land.

CHAP. XIX.

AFTER the misfortune and suspension of general Gates, immediate steps were taken by congress and the commander in chief, to restore the reputation of the American arms, to check the progress of the British, and defeat their sanguine hopes of speedily subduing the southern colonies. Major general Greene was ordered on to take the command in that quarter. He arrived about the middle of autumn, one thoufand feven hundred and eighty, at the head-quarters of general Gates; foon after which, every thing feemed to wear a more favorable appearance, with regard to military arrangements and operations in the American army.

General Gates furrendered the command with a dignity and firmness becoming his own character, conscious that his disappointment and defeat did not originate in any want of courage or generalship, but from the unavoidable and complicated difficulties of existing circumstances. General Greene succeeded him, received the charge of the army, and took leave of general Gates, with a delicacy and propriety that evinced the high respect he felt for his predecessor.

All the prudence and magnanimity, valor and humanity, that adorned the character of general Greene, were necessary in the choice of difficulties that attended his new command. He had succeeded a brave, but unfortunate officer, whose troops were intimidated by recent defeat, dispirited by their naked and destitute situation, in a country unable to yield sufficient subsistence for one army, and which had for several months been ravaged by two.

Lord Cornwallis's army was much superior in number and discipline, his troops were well clothed and regularly paid, and when general Greene first arrived, they were slushed by recent successes, particularly the defeat of general Gates. It is true, the death of major Ferguson and the rout of his party, was a serious disappointment, but not of sufficient consequence to check the designs and expectations of a British army, commanded by officers of the first military experience.

The inhabitants of the country were indeed divided in opinion; bitter, rancorous, and cruel, and many of them without any fixed political principles. Fluctuating and unftable, fometimes they were the partifans of Britain, and huzzaed for royalty; at others, they were the militia of the state in continental service, and professed themselves zealots for American independence. But general Greene, with remarkable coolness and intrepidity, checked their licentious conduct, and punished desertion and treachery by necessary examples of severity; and thus in a short time, he established a more regular discipline.

Skirmishing parties pervaded all parts of the country. No one was more active and busy in these scenes, than the vigilant Tarleton. An affray took place in the month of November, between him and general Sumpter. After victory had feveral times feemed to change fides, the continental troops won the field without much lofs. General Sumpter was wounded, but not dangeroully. The British lost in wounded and killed, near two hundred.

diame, "Her rang threshows a new a realist The British troops had yet met with no check, which had in any degree damped their ardor, except the defeat of major Ferguson. The most important movement which took place for fome time after this affair, was an action between general Morgan on the one part, and colonel Tarleton on the other, in the month of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one. General Morgan was an early volunteer in the American warfare: he had marched from Virginia to Cambridge, at the head of a body of riflemen, to the aid of general Washington, in one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five. He continued to fland ready to enter on the post of danger, in any part of the continent, where the defence of his country required the affiftance of the most valorous leaders. General Greene, convinced that no man could more effectually execute any command with which he was entrufted, ordered general Morgan with a confiderable force, to march to the western parts of South Carolina.

Lord Cornwallis having gained intelligence of this movement, difpatched colonel Tarleton in pursuit of general Morgan. In a few days, they met near the river Pacolet. General Morgan had reason to expect, from the rapid advance of colonel Tarleton, that a meeting would have taken place sooner; but by various manœuvres he kept his troops at a distance, until a moment of advantage might present, for acting with decided success. The Americans had rather kept up the appearance of retreat, until they reached a spot called the Cow-pens: fortunately for them, Tarleton came up, and a resolute engagement ensued; when, after a short conflict, to the great joy of the Americans, the British were routed, and totally defeated.

Colonel Tarleton, as one of the most resolute and active of the British partisans, was particularly selected by lord Cornwallis, and ordered to march with eleven hundred men, to watch the motions of Morgan, impede his designs, and keep in awe the district of Ninety-Six, toward which he found a detachment of the American army was moving. The unexpected deseat of Tarleton, for a time threw him into the back ground in the opinion of many of the British officers; nor was lord Cornwallis himself much better satisfied with his conduct.*

^{*} Sir Henry Clinton observed afterwards, "that the "unfortunate action at the Cow-pens, diminished lord "Cornwallis's army nearly one fourth." If this was true,

The name of Tarleton and his fuccesses, had so long been the terror of one side, and the triumph of the other, that neither had calculated on a derangement or defeat of his projects. But three hundred of his men killed in the action at Cow-pens, sive hundred captured, and himself obliged to sly with precipitation, convinced the people that he was no longer invincible. The militia of the country were inspirited, and many of them slocked to the American standard, who had heretofore been too much intimidated to rally around it.

Colonel Tarleton was feverely cenfured by the British officers, for suffering himself to be defeated, with his advantages of discipline, numbers, and everything else that in all human probability might have insured him victory. They did not tax him with a want of personal bravery; but some of them would not allow, that he had talents for any thing superior to the requisites for "a captain of dragoons, who might "skirmish and defeat in detail." However, he had certainly been considered by most of them in a higher point of view, before this missortune: but his slight, and the loss of his light troops, left a tarnish on his military character, it must have been by desertion, or by a sudden desection of the inhabitants of the state, who had previously aided him.

that could not be easily wiped off, or forgiven. The loss of these light troops, so peculiarly necessary in the present service, was selt through all the succeeding campaign. But Tarleton soon recovered himself, and returned from his slight: he appeared within a day or two, not far from the ground from which he had been beaten, and resumed his usual boldness and barbarity.

Tarleton's defeat was a blow entirely unexpected to lord Cornwallis, and induced him to march himself from Wynnesborough to the Yadkin, in pursuit of general Morgan, with the hope of overtaking him, and recovering the prisoners. The British troops endured this long and fatiguing march under every species of difficulty, over rivers, swamps, marshes, and creeks, with uncommon resolution and patience. What greatly enhanced their hardships and inconveniences, the path of their route was, as lord Cornwallis expressed it, "through one of the most rebellious tracts in America:"

General Greene, on hearing that his lordship was in pursuit of Morgan, left his post near the Pedee under the command of general Huger, and with great celerity marched with a small party of friends and domestics, one hundred and fifty miles, and joined general Morgan before lord Cornwallis arrived at the Catawba. In this pursuit, lord Cornwallis cut off some of the CHAR XIZ. fmall detachments, not in fufficient force for effectual opposition. It is true, general Davidfon made an unfuccessful stand on the banks of the Catawba, with three or four hundred men: but the British fording the river unexpectedly, he was himself killed, and his troops dispersed; and the croffing the river by the British army, was no farther impeded.

General Greene had ordered the colonels Huger and Williams, whom he had left fome days before at the Pedee, to join him with their. troops: however it was but a very short time after this junction, before general Greene had the highest reason to conclude, that the safety of his troops lay only in retreat; nor was this accomplished but with the utmost difficulty, as the way he was obliged to traverse, was frequently interrupted by fteep ascents and unfordable rivers. But he remarkably escaped a purfuing and powerful army, whose progress was, fortunately for the Americans, checked by the fame impediments, and at much less favorable moments of arrival. Though we do not affert, a miracle was wrought on the occasion, it is certain from good authority,* that the freshets Pedec rader the sommer of the sall incerfwelled, and retarded the passage of the British, while they seemed at times, to suspend their rapidity in favor to the Americans: and the piety of general Greene in several of his letters, attributed his remarkable escapes, and the protection of his little army, to the intervention of a superintending Providence.

Thus after a flight and a chace of fifteen or twenty days, supported by the most determined spirit and perseverance on both sides, general Greene reached Guilford about the middle of February, where he ordered all the troops he had left near the Pedee, under officers on whom he could depend, to repair immediately to him.

Lord Cornwallis at or near the fame time, took post at Hillsborough, and there erected the royal standard. General Leslie had according to orders left Virginia, and marched further fouth. He had arrived at Charleston about the middle of December. He without delay marched with fifteen hundred men, and foon overtook and joined lord Cornwallis, in the extreme part of the state. He had found the British commander immersed in cares, perplexity, and fatigue, endeavouring with all his ability, to restore by force the authority of his mafter, among a people, the majority of whom, he foon found to his mortification, were totally averse to the government and authority of Great Britain. General Leflie continued with him until fome time after the battle of Guilford, and by his bravery and activity was effentially ferviceable to the royal cause.

At Hillsborough, lord Cornwallis, by proclamation, called upon all the faithful votaries to the crown of Britain, to repair immediately to his camp with ten days provisions, to affift in the full restoration of constitutional government. Numbers from all parts of the country, listened anew to the invitations and threatenings of the British commander, and moved with all possible dispatch towards his camp. But many of them fell on their way, by the fatal mistake of misapprehending the characters and connexions of the partifans about them. It must be extremely difficult in a country rent in funder by civil feuds, and in arms under different leaders of parties opposed to each other, to know at once, in the hurry and confusion of croffing and re-croffing to join their friends. whether they were not encircled by their enemies.

Tarleton himself had sometimes mistaken his own partisans for the friends of congress: thus many of the royalists, as they were hastening to take protection under the banners of their king, were cut down by the same hand that spread slaughter and desolation among the opposers of the monarch. Many unfortunate victims of the sword, drew destruction upon themselves by

CHAP. XIX. fimilar mistakes. An instance of this, among others shocking to the feelings of humanity, was the maffacre of three or four hundred of. this description of persons, headed by a colonel Pyles. They accidentally fell in the way of a continental detachment, commanded by general Pickens. The royalists mistaking the republicans for Tarleton and his party, whom Pickens was purfuing, they acknowledged themselves the fubjects of the crown, made a merit of their advance, and called on colonel Tarleton as their leader: nor were they undeceived but by the blow that deprived them of life. It is indeed to be much lamented, that they were treated with as little mercy, and all cut down with equal cruelty, to any that had been experienced by the Americans from the most remorfeless of their foes.

> While in this state of confusion and depredation through the whole country, general Greene and lord Cornwallis lay at no great distance from each other: but Greene kept his position as much as possible concealed, as he was not yet in a fituation to venture a decifive action: and though he was obliged to move earlier towards the British encampment, no engagement took place until about the middle of March. In the mean time, by his ability and address, he eluded the vigilance of his enemies, and kept himfelf fecure by a continual change of posts, until strengthened by fresh reinforcements of the North Carolina and Virginia militia. The few CHAP. XIX. continental troops he had with him, joined by these, and a number of volunteers from the interior mountainous tracts of the western wilderness, induced him to think he might risk a general action.

On the fifteenth of March, the two armies met at Guilford, and feemed at first to engage with equal ardor; but as usual, the raw militia were intimidated by the valor and discipline of British veterans. Almost the whole corps of Carolinians threw down their arms and fled. many of them without even once discharging their firelocks. This of course deranged the American army; yet they supported the action with great spirit and bravery for an hour and a half, when they were entirely broken, and obliged to retreat with the utmost precipitation. Both armies fuffered much by the loss of many gallant officers, and a confiderable number of men. run each other , har Coesse legge Mar de m

Lord Cornwallis kept the field, and claimed a complete victory; but the fubfequent transactions discovered, that the balance of real advantage lay on the other fide. His lordship, immediately after the action at Guilford, proclaimed pardon and protection to all the inhabitants of the country on proper submission: vet at the same time, he found it necessary to quit his present ground. He had previously taken the determination, to try the fuccess of the British arms in North Carolina and Virginia. He formed this refolution early; and would have profecuted it immediately after Ferguson's defeat, in October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, had he not been detained by ficknefs. After his recovery he purfued the defign; and for this purpose had ordered general Leslie to leave Virginia, who (as has been observed) joined him with a large detachment of troops, about mid-winter. His lordship however, thought proper still to postpone his original defign, with the hope of bringing general Greene to a decided action, and thereby more firmly uniting the inhabitants of the country to the royal cause.

After the action at Guilford, and the difperfion of the American troops, lord Cornwallis found it difficult to procure forage and provifions fufficient for the fublishence of his army. He left the late field of action, and moved onwards a few miles, and halted at Bell's Mills, where he ftaid two days, and gave the troops a fmall fupply of provisions. From thence he moved flowly on account of his fick and wounded, to Crofs-Creek.

Germaine, that he had intended to continue thereabouts for fome fhort time; but a variety of disappointments that occurred, induced him to alter his resolution. In this letter he obferves:—"From all my information, I intend"ed to have halted at Cross-Creek, as a proper "place to refresh and resit the troops: and I "was much disappointed on my arrival there,

"to find it totally impossible. Provisions were "fcarce; not four days forage within twenty "miles; and to us the navigation of the Cape "Fear river to Wilmington, impracticable, for "the distance by water is upwards of one hun"dred miles. Under these circumstances, I "was obliged to continue my march to this "place."*

1781.

Lord Cornwallis having decamped from the neighbourhood of his late military operations, marched with all possible expedition toward the more eastern parts of North Carolina. He found many difficulties on his way, but pursued his route with great perseverance, as did his army; they cheerfully sustained the severest fatigue; but as they had frequently done before, they marked their way with the slaughter of the active, and the blood of the innocent inhabitants, through a territory of many hundred miles in extent from Charleston to York-Town. It was afterwards computed, that fourteen hundred widows were made during this year's campaign, only in the fingle diffrict of Ninety-Six.*

After the defeat at Guilford, general Greene availed himself of his religious opinions to obtain relief and affiftance from the neighbouring country. He had been educated in the Quaker denomination of Christians, but not too scrupuloufly attached to their tenets to take arms in defence of American liberty. The inhabitants in the vicinity of both armies, generally belonged to that fect: in the diffress of the retreating army, he called them out to the exercise of that benevolence and charity, of which they make the highest professions. He wrote and reminded them, that though they could not conscientiously, consistently with the principles they professed, gird on the fword for the usual operations of war, yet nothing could excuse them from the exercise of compassion and assistance to the fick and wounded; to this they were exhorted by their principles; and an ample field was now displayed to evince their fincerity by every charitable act.

His letters were more influential on this mild and unoffending body of people, than the proclamations of lord Cornwallis. They united to take care of the fick, to drefs the wounded, and make collections of provisions for the relief of the flying army. This was a very effential advantage to general Greene, whose considence in the simplicity and kindness of this body of people, relieved him from any anxiety and embarrassment, relative to the sick and wounded he was obliged to leave behind.

Their example probably had an influence on others of different denominations, and indeed on most of the people in the circumjacent villages, whom we shall soon see quitting the royal standard, and following the fortune of the routed commander and his army, notwithstanding the high hopes which had been entertained for a short time by the British, that this defeat would put an end to any other effective operations of the rebel general Greene, as they styled him in their letters.

In consequence of the action at Guilford, general Greene had to lament the loss of several valuable officers, among whom were the generals Stephens and Huger, dangerously wounded. But those who were faithful to the service, on principles of supporting the general liberties of their country, lost no part of their vigor or fortitude under the sharpest disappointments and misfortunes; but rallied anew, and set their hardy faces against the most adverse circum-flances, that might arise in the dangerous and uncertain conflict.

This, general Greene attested in all his letters: yet the ignorance of the people in general, the little knowledge they had of the principles of the contest, the want of stable principles of any kind among the generality of the inhabitants, rendered dependence on their sidelity very uncertain, on both sides the question, and put it beyond the calculation on events, as neither the British or American commanders could make an accurate statement of numbers from day to day, that belonged to their own army. Self-preservation often led both parties to deception; and the danger of the moment, sometimes, more than the turpitude of the heart, prompted them to act under disguise.

The letters and accounts of all the general officers, on both fides of the queftion, portray these difficulties in a style and manner more descriptive, than can be done by any one, who did not feel the complicated miseries which involved both armies, and the inhabitants of the Carolinas, at this period. To them the reader is referred, while we yet follow the American commander through perplexity, embarrassment, and fatigue, too complex for description.

After the defeat at Guilford, general Greene was far from being discouraged or intimidated by the victorious triumph of his enemies. He CHAP. XIX. retreated with a fleady flep, and retired only ten or fifteen miles from the scene of the late action. He had every reason to expect a second rencounter with the British army, who boasted that their victory was complete, though it was acknowledged by lord Cornwallis, that the action at Guilford was the bloodiest that had taken place during the war.* Yet when lord Cornwallis withdrew from the late scene of action, it did not appear fo much the refult of a fystematic defign of an able general, as it did that

This, with other circumstances, induced general Greene, after he had collected most of his fcattered troops, to follow his lordship rather than to fly further. The inhabitants of the country (fingular as it may appear) from this time more generally flocked to the camp of the defeated, than to that of the conquering general. A more thorough difaffection to British government hourly appeared, and a more impreflive alarm from the apprehensions of subjugation, feemed to discover itself from the day of the retreat at Guilford. Numbers from all quarters came forward; and general Greene foon found himself in a situation to pursue in his turn.

He accordingly followed the British army through cross roads and difficult paths, for about ten days; when finding his lordship declined meeting him again, and that by the rapidity of his movements their distance widened, general Greene thought it best to halt, and not further attempt to impede the route of the British commander toward Wilmington; and prepared himself to prosecute his previous design of relieving the state of South Carolina, without farther delay.

Within a few days he began his march toward Camden, the head-quarters of lord Rawdon, on whom the command had devolved, and who was there encamped with only nine hundred men. General Greene's approach was rather unexpected to Rawdon; but by a fudden and judicious advance, he fell on the Americans before they were in readiness for his reception. Notwithstanding this sudden attack, which took place on the twenty-fifth of April, general Greene, always cool and collected, fuftained a fevere conflict with his usual intrepidity; but was again obliged to retreat, though his numbers were fuperior. Yet he observed about this time, that he was not fo amply fupported as he might have expected, by aids from Virginia, Maryland, or elsewhere; and that in North Carolina, fuch was the fluctuation of opinion, the operation of fear, and a too general want of principle, that he could not place the ftrongest confidence in many who accompanied him.

Lord Rawdon attempted foon after to bring general Greene to a fecond engagement; but he too well understood the advantages he might gain by declining it. The confequences justifi-ed his conduct; as lord Rawdon, in a few days after the action at Camden, burnt many of the mills, adjacent private houses, and other buildings, and evacuated the post and moved toward Charleston, where he judged his presence was more immediately necessary. This sudden evacuation of Camden inspirited the Continentals, and inspired them with a dangerous enthusiasm, that for a time could not be resisted. The banks of the rivers and the country were fcoured by various partifans, in pursuit of forage and provisions, which were generally secured by the Americans, after skirmishing and fighting their way through small parties of the enemy, too weak for fuccessful opposition.

Sumpter, Marion, and other leaders, general Greene observed, "have people who adhere to "them, and appear closely attached; yet, per-"haps more from a desire, and the opportunity of plundering, than from an inclination to "promote the independence of the United "States." General Greene was attended and supported by many brave, humane and valiant officers, in his peregrinations through the Carolinas, but their followers were generally licentious beyond description. This sometimes impelled him to severities that wounded the feelings of the man, though necessary in the discipline of an army.

A detail of all the smaller rencounters that took place in this hoftile period in both the Carolinas, might fatigue, more than it would gratify, the humane or inquisitive mind. It is enough to observe, that the Americans, under various leaders and fome capital commanders, were continually attacking, with alternate fuccess and defeat, the chain of British posts planted from Camden to Ninety-Six: and as general Greene himfelf expressed his sentiments in their embarrassed situation,—"We fight, get beaten; "rife, and fight again: the whole country is "one continued scene of flaughter and blood. "This country may struggle a little longer; "but unless they have more effectual support, "they must fall."*

It is to be lamented, that very many in this day of general diffrefs, fuffered themselves to be governed either by vindictive passions, or their feelings of resentment for personal injuries. Many took advantage of the public confusion, to gratify, if not to justify, their own private revenge, a stronger stimulus with some, than any public or political principle. Befides thefe, there were numbers who feemed to enlift under the banners of liberty, with no views but those of rapine, affaffination, and robbery; and after they had for a time rioted in the indulgence of those infernal passions, they frequently deserted, and repaired to the British camp, and renewed each scene of villany against the party they had just left. They were indeed well calculated to become instruments in the hands of the British officers, to perpetrate the cruelties they were too much disposed to inslict on the steady adherents to the American cause. Thus, whether they pretended to be the partisans of the one side or the other, rapacity and violence raged among a sierce people, little accustomed to the restraints of law and subordination.

The manners of the mountaineers and borderers of the Carolinas, exemplified too strongly the native ferocity of man. Though descended from civilized ancestors, it cannot be denied, that when for a length of time, a people have been used to the modes of savage life common to the rude stages of society, not feeling themselves restrained by penal laws, nor under the influence of reason or religion, nor yet impressed by apprehensions of disgrace, they sink into the habits of savages, and appear scarce a grade above the brutal race. Thus it required a very severe military discipline, to reduce to order the rude peasantry that poured down from the

Diffension, mutiny, robbery, and murder, fpread to an alarming degree. There were too many instances of villany and barbarity, to render it neceffary to adduce more than a fingle fact, that may convey an idea of the hazard of life without the risk of battle. We mention therefore only the death of a colonel Grierson, a diftinguished loyalist, because this circumstance is particularly noticed by the commanders of both armies. This gentleman was shot by an unknown hand, after he had furrendered his arms to the Americans. Great exertion was made to discover the perpetrator of this cruel deed: general Greene offered a reward of one hundred guineas for the detection of the murderer, but without effect: private affaffination had become too familiar a crime in that hoffile country, for the perpetrators to betray each other.

Perhaps few officers could have extricated themfelves, and recovered from the unforeseen embarrassiments that attended him through the southern campaign, with the facility, judgment, and perseverance, that marked the conduct of the American commander in the Carolinas. His mind was replete with resources in the greatest difficulties, and his resolution equal to the severest enterprise. While the humanity of his disposition led him to soften as much as possible the horrors of war, the placidity of his manners engaged the affections of his friends, and the esteem and respect of his enemies. Yet he was obliged to make some severe examples of atrocious characters, and to punish by death, several who were detected under the description of deserters and affassins.

After the action at Camden, Marion, Pickens, and Lee, with their partifans, attacked and carried a number of small forts in the district of Ninety-Six, with little or no effectual opposition, until they crossed the Santee, and attacked fort Cornwallis, commanded by colonel Brown, who defended it with great spirit and gallantry. As the Americans approached, the British garrison, for their own better security, nearly covered themselves under ground. They obstinately resuled to surrender, until every man who attempted to sire upon the besiegers, was instantly shot down; but after a siege of twelve or sourteen days, the fort, with about three hundred men, was surrendered by capitulation.

Brown had been fo barbarous and ferocious a partifan, that he was hourly apprehensive of meeting with summary vengeance from the hands of some of those who had suffered, either in their persons or their friends. Many he had murdered in cold blood; others he had cruelly delivered into the hands of the favages, to fuffer longer torture. But the victor, feeling compassion for individual fuffering, sent him under an efcort for his better security, to Savannah. Without this indulgence, he must have fallen an immediate facrifice, as he had to pass through a long tract of country, where he had been active in perpetrating the severest cruelties, accompanied by a number of loyalists, between whom and the adherents to the American cause, there raged such an infernal spirit of bitterness, that extermination seemed to be equally the wish of both parties.

The leaders of the American partifans were frequently checked by the humane advice of general Greene. He exhorted them, that it was more their duty by their lenity to induce those in opposition, to unite with them in supporting the cause of freedom, than it was to aim at their extermination. In a letter to Pickens he observed, that "the principles of humanity as well as policy required, that "proper measures should be immediately taken, "to restrain abuses, heal differences, and unite "the people as much as possible."

While these desultory excursions were kept up, general Greene was endeavouring to concentrate his forces for the prosecution of more important objects. Many occurrences had redounded much to his honor, though some of CHAP. XIX. them were unfortunate. But his misfortunes did not impair his military reputation; nor was his courage or ability called in question on his affault on Ninety-Six, though it did not terminate agreeably to his hopes. The garrison was defended with the greatest spirit and ability by lieutenant colonel Cruger. They fuftained a fiege with almost unexampled bravery, from the twenty-fourth of May to the eighteenth of June.

Notwithstanding the valor of the British troops, and the fortitude of their commander, they were reduced to the point of furrender, when by the address of an American lady, prompted by a laudable affection for her hufband, a British officer within the garrison, she found means to convey a letter to colonel Cruger, with the pleafing intelligence, that if they could hold out a short time longer, their deliverance might be certain: that reinforcements were at hand; that lord Rawdon was marching to their relief with two thousand fresh troops, who had arrived within feven days from Ireland.

It was happy for general Greene, that he obtained early information that this ftrong body was on their way, and was hourly expected by his antagonists; but it was very affecting to the feelings of honor, patriotifm, or pride, to find himself obliged to raise the siege, almost in the moment of victory, and to retreat with precipitation from a spot, where but a day before, he had reason to flatter himself he should reap the laurels of conquest. This unexpected turn of affairs was truly distressing to the American commander. It was painful and humiliating to be compelled again to sly before a pursuing enemy, to the extreme parts of a country he had recently trodden over with so much fatigue and peril.

Some of his affociates were fo much disheartened by the untoward circumstances of the campaign, that they advised him to fly from Carolina, and to endeavour to fave himfelf and the remainder of his troops, by retreating to Virginia. To this advice, general Greene replied, in the laconic style of the Spartan, with the spirit of a Roman, and the enthusiasm of an American, -" I will recover this country, or " perish in the attempt." His subsequent conduct and fuccess justified his noble resolution. He foon collected the militia from the diffant parts of the state, called in his detachments, and infpirited his troops fo far, as to recover his usual confidence in them. This encouraged him to offer battle to lord Rawdon on the twelfth of July.

eral quarters, declined the challenge. This was not because he did not think himself in sufficient force to accept it: he had previously determined to return to Charleston, as soon as circumstances would permit. His presence was there necessary, not only on account of military arrangements, but from the confusion and disorder of civil affairs, the animosities of the citizens of different descriptions, the insolence of the loyalists, and the complaints of those who had been compelled to a temporary submission,

When lord Rawdon withdrew from Orangeburgh, he left a fufficient number of troops for its defence; and making due arrangements for the fecurity of other posts, he hastened to Charleston. On this, general Greene detached a part of his own army to march towards the capital, and returned himfelf with the remainder, and took post on the heights near the Santee. From thence he continually haraffed the British by fmall parties, who alternately returned thefe aggressions. Skirmish and defeat, plunder, flaughter, and devastation, were every where displayed, from the extremity of the country to the environs of the city. Several weeks elapsed before the operations of either army were more concentrated.

While the military operations against the Americans were vigorously pursued without, the devoted city of Charleston suffered misery beyond description within. Severity, cruelty, and despair, raged for a time without check or control. A single instance of inhumanity, in the facrifice of one of the victims of their refentment, will be sufficient to evince the rigor and impolicy of British measures. The execution of colonel Hayne will leave a stain on the character of lord Rawdon, without exhibiting any other proofs of barbarous severity.

This gentleman had been a diftinguished and very active officer in the American fervice, previous to the fubjugation of Charleston. When this event took place, he found himself called to a separation from his family, a dereliction of his property, and fubmission to the conqueror. In this fituation he thought it his duty to become a voluntary prisoner, and take his parole. On furrendering himfelf, he offered to engage and stand bound on the principles of honor, to do nothing prejudicial to the British interest until he was exchanged; but his abilities and his fervices were of fuch confideration to his country, that he was refused a parole, and told he must become a British subject, or submit to close confinement.

His family was then in a distant part of the country, and in great distress by sickness, and from the ravages of the loyalists in their neighbourhood. Thus he seemed impelled to acknowledge himself the subject of a government he had relinquished from the purest principles, or renounce his tenderest connexions, and leave them without a possibility of his affistance, and at a moment when he hourly expected to hear of the death of an affectionate wife, ill of the small-pox.

In this state of anxiety, he subscribed a declaration of his allegiance to the king of Great Britain, with this express exception, that he should never be required to take arms against his country. Notwithstanding this, he was soon and repeatedly called upon to arm in support of a government he detested, or to submit to the severest punishment. Brigadier general Patterson, commandant of the garrison, and the intendant of the British police, a Mr. Simpson, had both affured colonel Hayne, that no such thing would be required; and added "that "when the royal army could not defend a country without the aid of its inhabitants, it "would be time to quit it."*

Colonel Hayne confidered a requisition to act in British service, after assurances that this would never be required, as a breach of contract, and a release in the eye of conscience, from any obligation on his part. Accordingly he took the first opportunity of resuming his arms as an American, affumed the command of his own regiment; and all fond of their former commander, colonel Hayne marched with a defensible body to the relief of his countrymen, then endeavouring to drive the British partisans, and keep them within the environs of Charleston. He very unfortunately in a short time fell into the hands of a strong British party, sent out for the recovery of a favorite officer,* who had left the American cause, and become a devotee to British government.

As foon as colonel Hayne was captured, he was closely imprisoned. This was on the twenty-fixth of July. He was notified the same day, that a court of officers would assemble the next day, to determine in what point of view he ought to be considered. On the twenty-ninth he was informed, that in consequence of a court of inquiry held the day before, lord Rawdon and lieutenant colonel Balfour had resolved upon his execution within two days.

His aftonishment at these summary and illegal proceedings can scarcely be conceived. He wrote lord Rawdon, that he had no intimation of any thing more than a court of inquiry, to determine whether he should be considered as an American or a British subject: if the sirft, he ought to be set at liberty on parole; if the last, he claimed a legal trial. He assured his lordship, that on a trial he had many things to urge in his defence; reasons that would be weighty in a court of equity; and concluded his letter with observing,—"If, sir, I am resusting that I cannot conceive from your justice or humanity, I earnestly entreat that my execution may be deferred; that I may at least take a last farewell of my chil-

But his death predetermined, his enemies were deaf to the voice of compassion. The execution of his sentence was hastened, though the reputation and merits of this gentleman were such, that the whole city was zealous for his preservation. Not only the inhabitants in opposition to British government, but even lieutenant governor Bull at the head of the royalists, interceded for his life. The principal ladies of Charleston endeavoured, by their compassionate interference, to arrest or influence the relentless hand of power. They drew up and presented to lord Rawdon, a delicate and pathetic petition in his behalf. His near relations, and his children, who had just performed the funeral rites over the grave of a tender mother, appeared on their bended knees, to implore the life of their father. But in spite of the fupplications of children and friends, strangers and foes, the flinty heart of lord Rawdon remained untouched, amidst these scenes of fenfibility and diffrefs. No amelioration of the fentence could be obtained; and this affectionate father took a final leave of his children in a manner that pierced the fouls of the beholders. To the eldest of them, a youth of but thirteen years of age, he delivered a transcript of his case, directed him to convey it to congress, and ordered him to see that his father's remains were deposited in the tomb of his anceffors.

Pinioned like a criminal, this worthy citizen walked with composure through crowds of admiring spectators, with the dignity of the philosopher, and the intrepidity of the christian. He suffered as a hero, and was hanged as a felon, amidst the tears of the multitude, and the curses of thousands, who execrated the perpetrators of this cruel deed.

Soon after this transaction, lord Rawdon, on account of the broken state of his health, obtained leave to repair to England. Captured on his passage by the count de Grasse, he was detained a short time; but soon after his arrival on the shores of Great Britain, his singular treatment of colonel Hayne was the topic of every conversation; and was proved to have been so pointedly severe, as to be thought worthy of parliamentary discussion. The strictures of the duke of Richmond thereon were pointed with severity. He thought the dignity and humanity of the nation, called loudly for a court of inquiry on high-handed executions, without trial, or any opportunity given for legal defence.

This motion however, was productive of no confequences, except the ebullitions of lord. Rawdon's refentment; who, it was observed, conducted more with the violence of a soldier of untutored manners, than with the urbanity or the politeness of the gentleman. He wrote to the noble duke in high and offensive language, little if any thing short of a direct challenge; but his grace did not deign to think himself accountable to an individual, for defending the principles of equity, and the cause of the injured, in the freedom of parliamentary debate and investigation.

After lord Rawdon had taken leave of America, and embarked for England, the command of the British army in Charleston devolved on colonel Balfour. This officer, though a brave man, was not distinguished for his humanity; nor did he seem more disposed, on a new acquisition of power, to soften the rigors of war, than his predecesfors in command.

It had, previous to the present period, appeared by the letters of colonel Balfour, that his apprehensions relative to the fouthern campaign, and the termination of the war, had been clouded to a confiderable degree. He had written to fir Henry Clinton on the fixth of May, that "their fituation was exceedingly dif-"treffing and dreadful, notwithstanding lord "Rawdon's brilliant fuccesses; that the ene-"my's parties were every where; that the "communication with Savannah by land was " every where cut off; that the colonels Brown, "Cruger, and others, at different important "posts, were in the most critical situation." He added in the same letter :- " Indeed I " fhould betray the duty I owe your excellency, "did I not represent the defection of this prov-"ince fo univerfal, that I know of no mode, "fhort of depopulation, to retain it. The "fpirit of revolt is kept up by the many offi-66 cers, prisoners of war: I should therefore 66 think it advisable to remove them, as well "as to make fome striking examples of such as 66 had taken protections, yet fnatch every occa-"fion to rife in arms against us."

Whether colonel Balfour wished to be the executioner of this cruel policy or not, he justified it in his answer to general Greene, who demanded the reason of Hayne's execution. Balfour replied, that it took place by the joint orders of lord Rawdon and himself, in consequence of lord Cornwallis's directions, to put every man to death who might be found in arms, if he had been received as a subject of Great Britain, after the capitulation of Charleston in one thousand seven hundred and eighty.

General Greene threatened retaliation; but his humanity led him to the suspension of such feverities, though he felt wounded at the treatment of a person of such real merit as colonel Hayne, and the premature stroke that robbed his country and his family of this brave, unfortunate man. He pointedly criminated the authors of his death, as acting an unjust, inhuman, and an illegal part. In a letter to colonel Balfour he observed, that he was happy for the honor of colonel Hayne, that nothing could be found against him to warrant his execution, but "the "order of lord Cornwallis, given in the hour " of victory, when he confidered the lives, lib-"erties, and property of the people, proftrate "at his feet. But I confess I cannot repress my "aftonishment, that you and lord Rawdon " fhould give fuch an extraordinary example of "feverity, upon the authority of that order, "under fuch a change of circumftances, folong "after it had been remonstrated against by my-"felf, in a letter to lord Cornwallis. I inform-"ed his lordship, that his orders were cruel and

Indeed it was the universal voice, that the conduct of Rawdon and Balfour in this affair, could be juftified by no law, civil or military, and was totally repugnant to the spirit of humanity, or to divine injunctions. General Greene declared in the most folemn manner, that he had never authorifed or countenanced executions on fuch principles; that he had done all in his power to foften refentment, to conciliate the inhabitants of different descriptions, and to prevent as much as possible all private affassinations, which had too frequently taken place, in fpite of discipline or humanity; and that he fanctioned no public executions, but for the crimes of defertion and murder; crimes which by no conftruction could be charged on colonel Hayne.

But the death of this worthy man, the victim of refentment, was not avenged by retaliation, as threatened. It was postponed from the humanity and generosity of the American commander, as well as from the uncertainty of all human events, and the impossibility of calculating from

Fierce rencounters were still kept up between the British detachments posted on advantageous heights, and on the banks of deep and unfordable rivers which interfected each other, and the hardy chieftains who led the Carolinian bands, over mountains, declivities, fwamps, and rivers, to the vicinity of the city. Thence they were often obliged to retreat back from the borders of civilization and fofter habitations, again to feek fafety in the dreary wilderness, to which they were purfued by their enemies, who were fometimes repelled, at others fuccefsful in cutting off the little parties of Americans; until the British, wearied by the mutual interchange of hostilities without decision, drew in their cantonments, and took post about the beginning of September, at the Eutaw Springs, which were fituated at the distance of only fifty miles from Charleston.

General Greene had, when near the waters of the Congaree, while they were feparated at the distance of only sifteen miles, attempted to bring them to a closer engagement; but there appeared at that time no inclination in the British to meet him. He found they were about to take a new position. This induced him to follow them by a circuitous march of feventy or eighty miles. Defultory skirmishes continued during the month of August; but on the eighth of September, general Greene again renewed his challenge, fought and obtained an advantage, that was an over-balance for the many successless rencounters, that had long kept the public mind in suspense and apprehension, and Greene's army in such a continual sluctuation, that there was no calculating its numbers or its strength, from day to day.

General Greene advanced to the Springs, where the main body of the British troops were collected. He had with him only about two thousand men; but these were commanded by fome of the best of his officers. They attacked and routed the British encampment, The action was fevere. Great numbers of the British officers and foldiers were either flain or captured. Yet the Americans fuffered fo much, that colonel Stuart, the British commander, claimed the advantage. Indeed, general Greene fuffered the lofs of many brave foldiers, and fome very valuable officers. A colonel Campbell of Virginia, fell toward the termination of the action, and had time after the mortal wound only to observe, that "as the British fled, he "died contented."

much on the occasion, the action at the Eutaw Springs put a period to all farther offensive operations in that quarter; and the British troops after this, seldom ventured far beyond the boundaries of Charleston. Besides the numbers slain in this action, sour or sive hundred of the British troops were made prisoners of war. The Americans suffered equally, and perhaps in greater proportion to their numbers, than the British: not less than five hundred men, and upwards of sixty officers, were killed or captured, besides the wounded. After this action, general Greene retired again for a time, to the heights bordering on the river Santee.

CHAP. XIX.

A new face to affairs now foon appeared in the city. The royal army had been fo much reduced by the vigilance and activity of general Greene, that what has been denominated by fome writers, a re-action of events, began to operate. The British adherents to monarchy in Charleston, and the power and influence of royal government, were in a short time brought very low. Consequently, the sufferings of those who had triumphed in the depression and subjugation of their own countrymen, were felt with almost equal rigor and severity, to that which had been inflicted on the opposers of British authority, when their commanders in all the info-lence of conquest, contemplated the certainty of the subjugation of the southern states.

Governor Rutledge had left the state of South Carolina and repaired to Philadelphia, after the surrender of Charleston. He now returned, and re-assumed the reins of government. Soon after his arrival in his native state, the governor published a proclamation offering pardon, on certain conditions, to all who had been aiding in British service, except such as had signed addresses, and voluntarily taken commissions to support the arms and authority of Great Britain.

The injunctions contained in this proclamation, dated the twenty-feventh of September, were rigorously executed. All those who were implicated as opposed either in principle or practice, to the interests or to the arms of their own country, felt heavily the reverse of a change of masters. The governor, feeling not only the miseries in which his native state had been so long involved, but the highest indignation at the treatment received by individuals, and the inflictions imposed on many by the severity of Rawdon and Balfour, suffered his resentment to fall indiscriminately on all the partisans of royalty.

Many who had reaped the fweets of changing with the times, by availing themselves of the property of those who had fled, were now CHAP. XIX. compelled by the governor to fly from their agreeable plantations. This description of people had feized the villas of those who had taken their standard under congressional protection, rather than relinquish their independence, by becoming fubjects of the king of England.

They had occupied without the city, the best accommodated fituations which had before belonged to the captured or exiled inhabitants, who had opposed the British invasion. This class of persons were now reduced to the necesfity of removing into a town still occupied by foreign troops. Driven into the city, and shut up with their families in inconvenient huts, the reverse of the easy accommodations to which they had lately been used, and the affluence which fome of them had formerly poffeffed, many of them fell a prey to fickness, and the concomitant miseries of war.

Nor lefs aggravated were the diffresses of those inhabitants within the city, whose fidelity to their country could not be shaken, and whose connexions were in arms without. They fuffered every kind of diftrefs, yet with the most heroic firmness; and even the ladies, in many inftances, gave a glorious example of female fortitude. They fubmitted patiently to inconveniences never before felt, to hardships they had never expected; and wept in fecret CHAP. XIX.

the miferies of their country, and their feparation from their tenderest connexions, with whom they were forbidden all intercourse, and were not permitted the soft alleviation of the exchange of letters. With becoming dignity, they had secluded themselves from the gaieties of the city; and refused on all occasions, to partake of any amusements in company with British officers; while with a charitable hand, they visited and soothed, whenever possible, the miserable victims crowded on board prison ships, and thrust into jails.

Their conduct was refented by the officers of the army, who themselves affronted them, and exposed them to insults of every kind, instead of defending the tender and helpless fex, as is justly expected, and required by the laws of civilization and humanity. But the busy hand of time was ripening events, that put a period to their afflictions; at least, for such of them as lived through the perils and hardships of the sleege, the capture of their city, the waste of their property, the exile from their families, and sufferings too many to recount, which are usually institted on the vanquished, by the conqueror.

Among those who lived to return from their banishment to St. Augustine, was the venerable Gadsden, who, through all the shocks of fortune, and the rotation of events which he experienced, was never fhaken in his principles. He had always deferved and retained the confidence of his country. A firm, uniform republican, he was chosen a member of the general congress which met at New York in one thousand seven hundred and fixty-five, He was a worthy delegate in the respected assembly which affumed and declared the independence of the United States, in one thousand seven hundred and feventy-fix. He had no predilection in favor of kings, and was ever averse to monarchic inflitutions and usages. This was probably a reason why he suffered such particular feverities from the British commander. Notwithstanding his long confinement in the caftle of St. Augustine, and his own personal fufferings, he lived to exemplify his humanity and generofity, toward perfons who had been acceffary, if not principals, in inftigating the British officers to cruelties toward him, which they would not otherwife have practifed.

The general affembly of the state was called upon to meet at Jacksonborough, the beginning of the ensuing year. Their constitution required a rotation of office, which rendered Mr. Rutledge ineligible to serve longer as their first magistrate. In consequence of this, Mr. Gadsden was chosen governor; but his advanced age and declining health, induced him to refuse the laborious task. This was a period of peculiar difficulty, in the administration of the civil affairs of the ftate. In the fessions at Jackson-borough, there was little lenity exercised toward that description of persons who had taken British protections, or had in any manner abetted their measures, either in the city or the field. Their property was consistent, many of their persons condemned to banishment, and the most rigorous prosecutions commenced against all suspected persons.

Though Mr. Gadsden had declined acting as governor of the state, he did not sit down an inactive spectator of the infringements of humanity or justice in society, into which persons might be hurried by an over-heated zeal, or the want of a proper restraint on the prejudices and passions of men. He vigorously opposed the proceedings of the assembly, which cut off the loyalists from returning to their allegiance, even if they wished it, and sitting down quietly in the bosom of their country.

It is now time to leave for the present, the deranged state of their civil police, and the hostile confusion which still pervaded the two most southern colonies, South Carolina and Georgia, and pursue the narrative of the march of the British army through North Carolina. The slaughter that accompanied this route, through every stage of its progress, is an unpleasant tale. There appeared few interludes of humane and generous deportment toward the miserable, from the borders of South Carolina, until lord CHAP. XIX. Cornwallis reached the important stand in Virginia, which finished his career of military fame and fuccefs, and again humbled the proud glory of the British arms, beneath the standard of the Americans.

But before we follow the conqueror of Charleston, in his pursuit of new victories in the more central part of the union, we will just observe, that no one of the thirteen United States felt more feverely the fatal confequences of revolutionary convulsions, than that of South Carolina. Many of the best of its citizens perished in the conflict; others, from independence and opulence were reduced to the lowest grade of hopeless penury, while they beheld with aftonishment, the fudden accumulation of fortune by those whom they had viewed as a fubordinate class, now grown up to incalculable wealth, amidst confusion and depredation. The convenient fituations for commerce which they had formerly occupied, were foon after possessed by British agents, sent on at the close of the war to reap the gleanings of property, by the demands of a speedy liquidation of old British debts.

Those debts could not be discharged by men whose plantations were ruined, their flaves enticed or stolen away, and every other species of property wasted in the general pillage. Their capital had been held for a confiderable time as a conquered city, by the invaders of life, liberty, and property, fanctioned by the authority of the king of England. It is obvious, that his patronage and protection fhould forever have nurtured the peace, prosperity, and growth of the American colonies. Both interest and policy dictated the wisdom of this line of conduct, which would have prevented the irretrievable blow, which rent in funder the empire of Britain.

But as a wounded limb, pruned or bent downwards, yet not destroyed by the hand of the rude invader, fometimes revives and flourishes with new vigor, while the parent stock is weakened, and its decay accelerated, by the exuberance of its former luxury and ftrength, fo may fome future period behold the United Colonies, notwithstanding their depression, and their energetic struggles for freedom, revivified, and raifed to a degree of political confideration, that may convince the parent state of the importance of their loss. They may perhaps be taught to dread any future rupture with a people grown strong by oppression, and become respectable among all nations, for their manly resistance to the tyrannous hand stretched out to enflave them.

IN the first moments of victory, the mind is generally elate with the expectation of applause, and the prospect of additional fame. This was exemplified in the conduct of lord Cornwallis, when the retreating Americans had turned their faces from the field at Guilford, and left him to publish proclamations, invitations, and pardon to the inhabitants of the south. The sceptre of mercy was held out to them, on condition that they were sufficiently humbled to become the obedient subjects of those, who had destroyed their liberty, their property, and the lives of their friends, to obtain inglorious conquest, and arbitrary dominion.

natural feelings of mankind, as to escape a disappointment from the conduct of the Carolinians. They revolted at the idea of seeing one American state after another, subdued and laid low at the feet of foreign conquerors. Many, whose minds had been held in a neutral state, previous to this period, now repaired with great precipitation to the congressional officers, and enlisted under their banners, for the defence of their native country.

Lord Cornwallis, after the action at Guilford and the retreat of general Greene, lost no time in expediting his previous plans of military arrangements; and, confiftently with his own character, he foon moved to endeavour to profecute them with fuccess. He had reason to calculate, that when he had finished a long and fatiguing march which lay before him, that he fhould meet general Phillips in Virginia, with a large body of troops, and by their junction impede all refistance, and re-establish the authority of their master in that rebellious state. Instead of a completion of these expectations, he had when he arrived there, only to witness a fresh instance of the uncertainty of human hope, followed by a train of new disappointments.

The British commander immediately hastened by the most convenient route to Wilmington, and from thence to Petersburgh. Innumerable difficulties had attended lord Corne wallis and his army, in his march from Guilford CHAP. YE. to Wilmington; but in his judgment, the march was abfolutely necessary. Such was the fituation and diffress of the troops, and so great were the fufferings of the fick and wounded, that he had no option left after they had decamped from the field of battle, and moved to Crofs-Creek. The army was obliged to pass a long way through a perfect defert, where there were neither provisions for their sublistence, nor water fufficient to carry the mills, even could they have procured a fupply of corn. At the fame time, he had reason to expect, that the whole country east of the Santee and Pedee would be in arms against them, notwithflanding his previous proclamation and promife of pardon, on his leaving Guilford,

He wrote fir Henry Clinton after his arrival at Wilmington, that he had reason to suppose, many who had taken part in the rebellion had been convinced of their error, and were defirous to return to their duty and allegiance:-That he had promifed them pardon, with few exceptions, on the furrendering of themselves, their arms, and ammunition: and that they fhould be permitted to return home, on giving a military parole:-That their persons and properties should be protected from violence: and as foon as possible, that they should be reftored to all the privileges of legal and conftitutional government.

These specious promises had little effect on the alienated inhabitants: no allurements could induce them to join heartily, in affifting the British commander to subjugate their native land. Their defection daily increased; and a more thorough aversion to the designs and the authority of the British government, almost univerfally appeared. This, his lordship himfelf attested. He observed afterwards in a letter to fir Henry Clinton, that "after the complete "victory at Guilford, his numbers did not in-" crease, though he had staid two days near the "field of action." His lordship acknowledged, that though he had marched through the part of the country where he had reason to suppose he had the most friends, he found himself equally disappointed and mortified. He observed, that-" Many of the inhabitants rode into " camp, shook me by the hand, faid they were "glad to fee me, and to hear that we had beat-"en Greene, and then rode home again; for "I could not get an hundred men in all the 66 Regulators' country to stay with me, even as " militia."*

This must have been a very unpleasant prelude to his lordship's march through a forlorn wilderness, interspersed with deep rivers, which must greatly impede an army encumbered with fick and wounded, who were many of them obliged to travel in waggons, while all were fcantily provided with clothes, shoes, or provisions. But notwithstanding all impediments, they reached Wilmington the seventh of April.

There, the commander found new fources of anxiety: he felt his apprehensions increased on account of the situation of lord Rawdon, on whom the command had devolved, when lord Cornwallis left Guilford. He had left with him only nine hundred men: but whatever dangers his little army might be exposed to from the pursuit of general Greene, which was now ascertained, it was impossible for lord Cornwallis to tread back his steps to their assistance. These considerations determined his lordship to take the advantage of general Greene's having left the back part of Virginia open, to march immediately into that state.

As he had received express injunctions from fir Henry Clinton, to leave the Carolinas as soon as possible, and repair to Virginia to the aid of general Phillips, it was his opinion, that his own movements were not optional. This officer had been fent forward to the Chesapeake with a reinforcement, in order to support the measures fir Henry Clinton had, early in the preceding winter, adopted, and for a time had entrusted general Arnold to prosecute.

Previous to lord Cornwallis's removal from Wilmington, he wrote general Phillips, that he was in great diffress at the reflection, that general Greene had taken the advantage of his abfence, and had marched towards South Carolina: that he had endeavoured to warn lord Rawdon of this danger; but that he had reason to think, his dispatches had been intercepted. He obferved, that "the mountaineers and militia had " poured into the back parts of that province; "and he much feared, that lord Rawdon's posts 66 would be fo diffant from each other, and his "troops fo fcattered, as to put him into the "greatest danger of being beat in detail: and "that the worst of consequences might happen "to most of the troops out of Charleston. "a direct move towards Camden, I cannot get "there time enough to relieve lord Rawdon; "and fhould he have fallen, my army would "be exposed to the utmost dangers, from the " great rivers I should have to pass, the exhaust-"ed ftate of the country, the numerous militia, "the almost universal spirit of revolt which pre-"vails in South Carolina, and the strength of "Greene's army, whose continentals alone are " almost as numerous as I am,"

His lordship seemed however determined to make a feint in favor of lord Rawdon, by moving towards Hillsborough; yet he did not seem to expect much advantage could result therefrom. His situation was such, that he appeared embarraffed in his decifions; nor could he eafily determine, under the difficulty of existing circumstances, what line of conduct would best promote the general cause in which he was engaged. In lord Cornwallis's letter to general Phillips, from which an extract is given above, dated Wilmington, April 24th, 1781, he informed him, that an attempt to march from thence to Virginia was exceedingly hazardous; and that many unforeseen dissiculties might render it totally impracticable; that he should however endeavour to surmount them, and as soon as possible attempt to march to the Roanoke. In the mean time, he cautioned general Phillips to take no steps that might expose the army with him to ruin, if in any event their junction should be retarded. He urged him to transmit the earliest intelligence from time to time, un-detachment of the marquis de la Fayette, to follow, to watch the motions, and if possible to defeat the fanguinary purposes of this newly would foon repair to the Chefapeake, under an able and experienced naval commander, the count de Barras. High expectations were formed by every class of Americans, that the affistance of France this year, would be sufficient to enable the armies of the United States to counteract, if not to defeat, the designs of the British commanders in their several departments.

Sir Henry Clinton, apprifed of these circumftances, and very apprehenfive for the fafety of his friends in Virginia, judged it necessary, there should be no further delay in sending a more respectable force to that quarter, to ftrengthen the hands of general Arnold. Arnold had, on his first arrival in Virginia, landed at Westover, and marched to Richmond, deftroying all before him, with little or no oppofition. He was affifted in his marauding exploits by colonel Simcoe, who marched from Richmond to Westham, and there destroyed one of the finest founderies for cannon in all America. They burnt, plundered, and deftroyed every thing before them as they moved. Yet fir Henry Clinton was convinced, that their numbers were not fusficient to facilitate his wifnes and fubdue the ftate, without a more ftrong and respectable force. In consequence of this determination, he had ordered major general Phillips, with four thousand men, to repair immediately to Virginia to fuccor Arnold. He likewise had directed lord Cornwallis to form a junction with general Phillips, as soon as the affairs of Carolina would admit of his transferring his command there, and leaving that state. By some expressions in the order, it seemed to be left discretionary with his lordship, to move when and where he thought proper: yet in consequence of this call, and the reasons annexed thereto, he thought himself obligated to hasten his march to meet general Phillips, according to the directions of fir Henry Clinton.

Lord Cornwallis, notwithstanding all the discouraging circumstances which he had encountered, and which at times still seemed to increase before him, did not lose sight of the objects of conquest, victory, and glory, to be acquired in Virginia. So prone is man to anticipate the completion of his own wishes, that he continues to cherish them, even after probabilities cease to exist. Thus the considence his lordship had in the military abilities of lord Rawdon, the repeated defeat of general Greene, and the broken state of his army, from the frequent instances of slight and desertion, still slattered him with ideas, that the Carolinas might yet be subdued.

troops were indeed in a miferable condition for a march of three hundred miles, in a hostile country, where they could not avail themselves of its produce, however necessary for their subsistence, without being impeded by skirmishing parties. Both the cavalry and infantry were in a very destitute situation, with regard to forage, provisions, and clothing; but these were not impediments sufficient to stop the progress of veteran troops, with an able commander at their head. They began their march on the twenty-sistence of May.

The route from Guilford to Wilmington, and from Wilmington to Petersburgh, was attended with unufual fatigue and difficulty; yet lord Cornwallis moved with cheerfulness and alacrity, fupported by the fanguine expectation and pleafing idea of triumph in the reduction of Virginia, in addition to the conquest of the Carolinas. Groundless as were these expectations, his lordship at that time flattered himself, that the work of fubduing the Carolinas was nearly finished, and that they should foon only have to take measures, for retaining in obedience those turbulent and refractory states. But when he had completed his march, and arrived at the destined spot, that opened to his imagination new fcenes of glory and victory, he found on every fide, embarrassments that he had not contemplated, and disappointments that

He met at Petersburgh the melancholy tidings of the death of general Phillips, from whose acknowledged military talents and experience, he had reason to expect advice and affiftance in every exigence. This brave and judicious officer, who had so often staked his life in the field of battle, fell a victim to fickness. Lord Cornwallis had no opinion of Arnold; he despised him as a man, or an officer, and hated him as a traitor. He wrote fir Henry Clinton, that experience had made him less fanguine; and that more arrangements were necessary for fo important an expedition as the prefent, than had ever occurred to general Arnold. To this his lordship added many other expressions of contempt and disgust, for this new favorite of the British commander in chief.

It is not strange, that many officers among the gallant troops of Great Britain, men of name and distinction, should be much chagrined at the rank given to, and the considence placed in, this unprincipled minion.

Before his death it had appeared, that major general Phillips, who had formerly fuffered by the bravery of Arnold and his affociates, was manifestly piqued at the attention paid to his advice, and the anxiety shewn by sir Henry Clinton for his fafety. Phillips had but recently obtained his liberty, after the convention of Saratoga: exchanged for general Lincoln, this expedition to Virginia was his first command, of any magnitude, after his releafe. He found in the orders received from general Clinton, fome mortifying expressions, and a letter that accompanied them contained ftill more. Clinton had indifcreetly intimated therein to general Phillips, that "the fecurity of Arnold and "his troops, at Elizabeth River, was the prin-"cipal object of Phillips's expedition to Vir-"ginia." For this expression, general Clinton found himself afterwards obliged to apologize. It was deemed grofsly affrontive to an highspirited officer, of the rank, merits, and military abilities, possessed by general Phillips.

From the circumftances already related, it appears clearly, that lord Cornwallis's route from Charleston to Virginia, was long, hazardous, and fatiguing. He had not traversed less than eleven or twelve hundred miles, when he reached Cobham on James River, including the necessary circuitous marches he was obliged to make, to avoid rivers, rapids, mountains, and other impediments to ease or expedition in travelling.

From this place he wrote fome of his most desponding and discontented letters to general Clinton. He found the British troops scattered in small detachments, and posted at a distance CHAP. XX. from each other in various parts of the country. He observed to fir Henry Clinton:-"One maxim appears to me to be absolutely " necessary, for the fafe and honorable conduct " of this war-which is, that we should have "as few posts as possible; and that wherever "the king's troops are, they should be in re-"fpectable force. By the vigorous exertions " of the present governors of America, large "bodies of men are foon collected: and I have "too often observed, that when a storm threat-"ens, our friends disappear."

Before lord Cornwallis left Cobham, he obferved in a letter to general Clinton, that "he wished to call his attention to the inutility of "a stand at an offensive post, that could have "no influence on the war that still existed in "Carolina, and that only gave them a few "acres of unhealthy fwamp in Virginia, liable "at any time to become a prey to the enemy, "without any fuperiority of force."*

From his first arrival in Virginia, he had declined acting with general Arnold; but he was not long mortified with the fight or the fociety of a man he fo much deteited. He did not reach Petersburgh till the twentieth of May, and in the beginning of June, he was relieved from an affociate fo difagreeable to the feelings of a man of honor, by Arnold's return to New York.

Sir Henry Clinton had various reasons for the recal of this officer: these he did not announce: but he doubtless thought, that from his constitutional boldness, and the desperate situation in which he would be found if deseated by the Americans, that Arnold would be a useful agent if New York should be seriously attacked. But the principal design appeared soon after, to be that of employing him in a business for which he was peculiarly calculated; the surprise, the plundering, and burning the plantations and desenceless towns, on the sea-coast of the state of Connecticut, and other places.

The unexpected and much lamented death of general Phillips, and the recal of general Arnold, a man held odious by Cornwallis in every point of view, left his lordship the sole responsibility for events in Virginia: and perhaps the movements and termination of the campaign there, were conducted with as much judgment, ability, and military skill, as could have been exhibited by any officer, involved in similar difficulties and embarrassiments.

It was not many weeks after lord Cornwallis arrived in Virginia, before the intelligence he received from the fouthward, filled him with CHAP. XX. the most serious and alarming apprehensions for the fafety of lord Rawdon. He found by the most authenticated accounts, that general Greene had taken the advantage of his absence, and had moved with all possible expedition toward the environs of Charleston; that success had attended his manœuvres in various instances; and that lord Rawdon had as frequently been disappointed in his systems. To return, and follow him, was impracticable; though in his opinion, the Carolinas were in the utmost danger of being lost to Great Britain. Yet the work affigned him in Virginia, required the talents and the vigilance of the ableft commander.

On his arrival in that state, he found the Americans in high spirits, and their troops strongly posted on the most convenient grounds. He found that general Arnold had done little to facilitate the conquest of Virginia. He had indeed burnt feveral houses, destroyed some stores, and murdered many of the inhabitants: but no confistent plan of conquest appeared to have been either arranged or executed. His lordship also felt heavily the death of general Phillips, from whom he expected much information and advice, in the critical emergencies that opened upon him the farther he advanced.

I THE LIFE HER METERS OF LINE

The orders of general Clinton were peremptory, and to Cornwallis appeared infcrutable: and in addition to the lift of perplexities and disappointments that daily thickened upon him, he received orders from fir Henry Clinton, to fend on a part of his troops for the defence of New York, which he still apprehended would foon be attacked by the combined armies of France and America,

Thus, embarraffed on every fide, his own fyftems deranged, his judgment flighted, and his opinions difregarded by the commander in chief, his lordship was evidently chagrined; yet he lost not the vigilance or activity of an officer of distinguished valor; and soon made an effort to concentrate his troops, and to place the main body of his army in the posts he judged best calculated for defence. In this he differed widely in opinion from fir Henry Clinton; but finally took his stand at York-Town, in obedience to the orders of the commander in chief.

The marquis de la Fayette had not been idle before the arrival of lord Cornwallis; and afterwards aided by the judgment and experience of the baron de Steuben, who arrived in the month of June, he kept the British troops in play for some time. But the number of his troops was inconsiderable, and most of them militia-men: they were easily routed in detached bodies, by the more experienced partifans who CHAP. XX. opposed them. Besides many officers of superior name and character, in the train of lord Cornwallis, he was attended with very many who had no higher description of talent, than what was necessary for fudden and bold invafion of the weak and defenceless, without any relentings, or compaffionate feelings toward the victims who fell into their hands. In a war like the prefent, they had many opportunities of indulging their propenfities, and exhibiting those talents.

The violent and cruel vigilance of colonel Tarleton is already too well known to require any comment. Among other British partisans of notoriety, was a colonel Hamilton, who had distinguished himself for his activity and his severity, from Georgia to Virginia. Not less active than either of the above, was a colonel Simcoe, more remarkable for intrigue, ftratagem, and furprife, than for the cool operations of the commander of magnanimity. The courage which is accompanied by humanity, is a virtue; but bravery that pushes through all dangers to destroy, is barbarous, is favage, is brutal.

These were the principal officers at this time, that headed the detachments in most of the marauding parties that infefted the state of Virginia. Simcoe had distinguished himself in this way through the Jersies, until taken prisoner by the Americans. When he recovered his liberty, he pursued the game; and became so perfect in the art of coup de main, that in one of his excursions in Virginia, he eluded even the vigilance of the baron Steuben, so far as to oblige him to remove with precipitation from an advantageous post, not without considerable loss.

Lord Cornwallis himself detailed some of the heroic feats of this trio, in a letter to fir Henry Clinton, dated Williamsburgh, June 30th. The principal design of his lordship was by their movements to prevent the junction of general Wayne, who was marching through Maryland to the affiftance of the marquis de la Fayette. He pushed his light troops over a river in haste, in order to effect this if possible. Finding it impracticable, and that in spite of all his efforts general Wayne had made good his march, and reached his intended post, he took the advantage of the marquis's passing the Rappahannock, and detached lieutenant colonels Simcoe and Tarleton, to disturb the affembly of the state, then fitting at Charlotteville. The refult of this excursion was the capture of several of the members of the affembly, and the wafte of the continental flores in that quarter. They destroyed at Charlotteville, and on their return,

The baron Steuben had his station at this time, at the point of Fork: he was surprised and obliged to retreat, after a short rencounter. Simcoe followed, and used every exertion to attack his rear guard: not effecting this, he destroyed as usual all the continental stores which lay in their way. There, and in the places adjacent, the Americans lost three or four thousand stand of arms, and a large quantity of powder and other stores. The baron had with him in this affray about eight hundred men, mostly militia.

After this, lord Cornwallis moved himself to Williamsburgh. There he gave fully and freely to sir Henry Clinton, his opinion of the only mode of effecting the security of South, and the reduction of North Carolina, which he found was expected from him both in England and America. He observed, that, in his judgment, "until Virginia was subdued, they could "not reduce North Carolina, or have any cer-"tain hold of the back country of South Caro-"lina; the want of navigation rendering it "impossible to maintain a sufficient army in "either of those provinces, at a considerable distance from the coast; and the men and "riches of Virginia furnishing ample supplies "to the rebel fouthern army. I will not fay

"much in praise of the militia of the fouthern "colonies; but the list of British officers and "foldiers killed and wounded by them since "last June, proves but too fatally, that they are "not wholly contemptible."*

It appears from all the correspondence and conferences between fir Henry Clinton, general Phillips, and other officers, that the British commander in chief had feriously contemplated an excursion to Philadelphia. He intimated in one of his letters to general Phillips, not long before his death, that they probably had more friends who would co-operate with them in the state of Pennsylvania, than either in Maryland or Virginia. He feems to have been led to this opinion, by the representations of a colonel Rankin. He urged this as an experiment that would redound much to the advantage of lord Cornwallis's operations in Virginia. General Clinton clearly discovered that he had a predilection, himself, in favor of the project. He asked the advice of the generals Phillips and Arnold on the fubject, after he had appeared to be predetermined to make the experiment.

he did not hefitate to remonstrate against drawing off four thousand men from Virginia, for service in the Delaware, in this critical exigence of affairs in all the more southern colonies. He observed in the same letter from which an extract is given above, that sir Henry Clinton being charged with the weight of the whole American war, his opinions of course were less partial, and were directed to all its parts; and that to those opinions it was his duty implicitly to submit.

He then adds, that-" Being in the place of " general Phillips, I thought myself called upon "by you, to give my opinion on the attempt "upon Philadelphia. Having experienced much "disappointment on that head, I own I would "cautiously engage in measures, depending "materially for their fuccess on the active af-" fistance from the country: and I thought the " attempt on Philadelphia would do more harm "than good to the cause of Britain; because, "fuppofing it practicable to get poffession of the "town, (which, befides other obstacles, if the " redoubts are kept up, would not be eafy) we " could not hope to arrive without their having "had fufficient warning of our approach, to " enable them to fecure specie, and the greatest " part of their valuable public ftores, by means " of their boats and shipping."

The difficulty of discriminating friends from foes in Philadelphia, the improbability that they could continue long there if they succeeded, the stronger necessity for all the troops that could be spared from New York to act in Virginia, and the hazard that would attend an attack on Philadelphia, were circumstances, that induced lord Cornwallis very judiciously to portray them in his letters to sir Henry Clinton, as an object where the balance of the risk far outweighed any promise of advantage.

It may easily be supposed, that those free opinions and advice, which he considered as obtruded, could not be very acceptable to the commander in chief at New York; more especially, as it was evident there had long existed heart-burnings and jealousies between sir Henry Clinton and lord Cornwallis. These were heightened by the warm altercations between them, with regard to the most convenient and advantageous posts for defence, as well as the arrangements for offensive operations.

The encampment of the marquis de la Fayette was at this time about eighteen or twenty miles from Williamsburgh. He had with him about two thousand men. This was a number far too short for any offensive movements against such a strong and forcible British army, as was then posted in Virginia. He was in impatient expectation of reinforcements, which he had CHAP. XX. now reason to conclude as certain, from the junction of the American and French troops commanded by the count de Rochambeau. But the marquis was obliged to act again, before there was time for his relief by the arrival of his friends.

Lord Cornwallis endeavoured before the middle of July, to cross James River and pass his army to Portsmouth. The marquis de la Fayette fent forward the Pennfylvania line, with fome other detachments, to impede their paffage. This brought on a fmart engagement, which terminated with confiderable lofs on both fides. The approach of evening, with other difadvantageous circumftances, obliged the Americans to retreat, leaving the few cannon they had with them behind: the darkness of the night prevented a pursuit. The next day the British passed the river; but not without some difficulty from its width, which was about three miles.

The marquis la Fayette, through the difficulties which he had to encounter in Virginia, had on all occasions conducted with more valor, caution, prudence, and judgment, than could have been expected from fo young an officer. When the haron de Steuben joined him in the month of June, he had few men under his command, except the militia, whose numbers were indeterminate.

and the time of their continuance in fervice always uncertain. Yet much generalfhip and military address had been shewn on various occasions, both by the young hero and the aged veteran. They through all the summer, opposed the vigilance and superior force of lord Cornwallis, with great courage and dexterity.

Lord Cornwallis had made feveral judicious attempts to furprife the marquis with his little armament, confifting, as his lordfhip occasionally observed, "mostly of unarmed peasantry." But wary and brave, his ability and judgment had supplied the deficiencies, and balanced the weakness of his detachment; and before the arrival of the generals Washington and Rochambeau, the marquis de la Fayette had rendered very effential service to the American cause, by his valor and firmness in the state of Virginia.

Lord Cornwallis had been but a few days at Portsmouth, before he received a letter from sir Henry Clinton, censuring him in direct terms for attempting to pass James River, and taking his stand at Portsmouth, though he had before recommended this to general Phillips, as a convenient post. He observed, that he had slattered himself, until he had the honor to receive his lordship's letter of the 8th of July, "that "upon re-considering the general purport of our "correspondence, and general Phillips's papers "in your possession, you would at least have "waited for a line from me, in answer to your letter of the 30th ultimo, before you finally determined upon so serious and mortifying a move, as the repassing James River, and retiring with your army to Portsmouth. And I was the more induced to hope that this would have been the case, as we both seemed to agree in our opinion of the propriety of taking a healthy station on the neck between York and James Rivers, for the purpose of covering a proper harbor for our line of batit the ships."

Through all his correspondencies, orders, commands, countermands, and indecision, during the present summer, no man ever appeared more embarrassed, or more totally at a loss how to arrange his military manœuvres, than did general Clinton. He appeared at times to consider the reduction of Virginia as a primary object, and that it was of the highest importance that lord Cornwallis should be there strengthened and supported, both by sea and land: at other periods, he treated the operations there in so light a manner, that his ideas could not be comprehended, even by so intelligent an officer as lord Cornwallis.

It was not more than three or four weeks previous to the date of the above letter, that fir Henry Clinton had preffed his lordship, as if in a fudden fright, to fend him two thousand troops to aid in the defence of New York: and, as if under fome panic-ftruck influence, he faid,-"The fooner they are fent the better; "unless your lordship may have adopted my " plan to move to Baltimore, or the Delaware "Neck, and put yourfelf in a way to co-operate "with us; but even in that case, you can spare " us fomething I suppose. From all the letters "I have feen, I am of opinion, if circumstances " of provisions, stores, &c., turn out as they "wish, that the enemy will certainly attack "this post. As for men for such an object, in "this (circumstanced as they suppose it to be) "it cannot be doubted that they can raife a fuf-"ficient number."

Sir Henry Clinton had found by an intercepted letter, that there were eight thousand men collected at West Point, and that others were coming in very fast. He informed Cornwallis, that he had certain intelligence that admiral Barras had failed from Rhode Island; that many circumstances had put it beyond a doubt, that the design was to form a junction between him and general Washington, and that they meditated an attempt on the post at New York.

It is needless to detail much more of the correspondencies of the British officers acting at this time in America: their characters are fufficiently elucidated, not only by their own letters, but by fubfequent transactions. It is enough to observe, that by the correspondence of the general officers, afterwards published in England, it clearly appears, that they did not harmonize in opinion: their councils at this time were confused, and their plans indecisive.

Yet it is worthy of notice, that diftrust, diffension, and vilification, were kept up equally between some of the British naval commanders and fir Henry Clinton. In one of his confidential letters he complained, that "all opportuni-"ties of advantage were impeded or lost, by the "flowness and obstinacy of the admiral." He observed, that "his strange conduct had, if possible, been more inscrutable than ever: at one "time, he declared he was immediately going "home; at another, he had sworn that he "knew nothing of his recal."

In a fecret and confidential letter to general Phillips, fir Henry Clinton affured him, that "if "he was not better fatisfied by the next poft, "relative to the recal of admiral Grayes, he "fhould probably leave the management of him "folely to lord Cornwallis."* In this letter he cenfured his lordship in direct terms, for leaving the Carolinas but half subdued, to pursue the chi merical project of doubtful conquests in Virginia. He afferted, that his invitation, not his commands to his lordship, to come to the Chefapeake, was on the supposition that every thing was settled in the Carolinas, agreeably to the wishes of administration, and the designs of the government of England.

Sure of the confidence of general Phillips, fir Henry Clinton expressed the utmost astonishment, that "with nine British battalions, a le"gion of infantry, a detachment of yaughers, "five Hessian and several provincial battalions, "fome American light-horse, and large detach"ments of artillery and dragoons, that lord "Cornwallis should yet pretend that he want"ed forces sufficient for the most solid opera"tions in Virginia."*

He fneered at his lordship's idea, that it was impossible to act with his army in Carolina, without the assistance of friends. This reflection alluded to a letter received by him, in which lord Cornwallis observed, that the royal cause had sew friends in that country, and that when a storm threatened, even those sew disappeared. An historian has observed, that "Chosroes relinquished the Colchian war in

66 the just perfuasion, that it is impossible to hold CHAP. XX. "a distant country, against the wishes and efforts of its inhabitants."* His lordship might probably be of the fame opinion. This opinion was justified by his own experience, in too many mortifying inftances for the tranquillity of a man of his fenfibility.

It has been above observed, that by the fudden death of general Phillips, all these letters fell into the hands of lord Cornwallis, with feveral others of the fame style and tenor. This circumstance greatly aggravated the diffension and difgust, between the commanding officers in New York and Virginia. Yet notwithstanding the implied cenfure or reproach which they contained, in most of fir Henry Clinton's letters afterwards to lord Cornwallis, he had written with great complaifance, and had expressed the highest confidence in his lordship's abilities and judgment. But the breach became irreconcileable.

Through the whole bufiness, lord Cornwallis constantly affirmed, that his force was infufficient even for defensive operations. He took the liberty to intimate to fir Henry Clinton, that notwithstanding there had been a call for a part of his troops for the defence of New York, that he had never been under any apprehensions for the fafety of that city. With the fame freedom, he remonstrated against a plan that had been meditated by the commander in chief at New York, for an attack on the city of Philadelphia.

His lordship afferted with some degree of warmth, that it appeared to him highly imprudent, that any part of his army should be detached for that or any other purpose. But he observed further, that in his subordinate situation, unacquainted with the instructions of administration, ignorant of the forces under the command of his excellency general Clinton, and without the power of making arrangements, he could only offer his opinion: that plans of execution must come from himself, who had the materials for forming, as well as the power of executing.

These remonstrances had little weight with the British commander in chief. It appears through all their correspondence, that these gentlemen differed very widely in opinion, with regard to the modes of action, the numbers necessary for effective execution, the best posts for defence, and indeed in the general plan of all their operations. However, fir Henry Clinton still kept up the idea of supporting the war in Virginia, and of aiding lord Cornwallis to the utmost, notwithstanding he had sent an order to draw off a part of his troops.

After he was thoroughly alarmed at the hazardous fituation of the commander in Virginia, he relinquished his chimerical project of attacking Philadelphia; he countermanded the orders for drawing off a confiderable part of the troops; and endeavoured to haften on a fmall fquadron of British ships then lying at Sandy-Hook. He flattered himself that a few ships under the flag of Britain, might intercept the fleet, and interrupt the defigns of admiral Barras, who had failed from Rhode Island; or retard a still more important object, the arrival of the count de Grasse in the Chesapeake. where he was hourly expected. He made fome other ineffectual efforts for the relief of the British army, which was soon after cooped up by a large French fleet that arrived within the Capes.

The diffension, discord, and division of opinion, among the British officers, was not all that occasioned the fatal delay of strengthening lord Cornwallis in Virginia; it may be ascribed more to that atmosphere of doubt in which sir Henry Clinton was involved. Irresolute measures are ever the result of a consusion of ideas. The vast object of reducing such a wide extended country, and setting the wheels of operation in motion, so as to work with equal facility, from Georgia to Virginia, from Virginia to the north, and from Canada to the eastern extreme,

His mind feemed for a time to be plunged in a chaos, uncertain where to begin, in the complicated difficulties of his official duties, or where to fet the strongest materials of his machinery to work in all its parts, in a manner that would produce a complete system of conquest through the United States. There was no desiciency of courage, ardor, or sidelity to their master, among the officers of the crown, however diffentient in opinion with regard to the modes of execution. But these diffensions prevented that ready co-operation in action, which is necessary both to defeat the designs of their enemies, and to complete their own systems by judicious and prompt decision, and the immediate execution of well digested plans.

The movements of the continental and French army, had alarmed fir Henry Clinton to fuch a degree, that he long perfifted in his determination of recalling a part of the troops from Virginia, for the immediate defence of New York. He informed lord Cornwallis, that general Washington had with him eight or ten thousand men, besides the French battalions; and observed, that every one acquainted with the disposition of the inhabitants east of the Hudson, must be sensible in what manner their appearance would affect the numerous and war- CHAP. XX. like militia of the New England states.

Sir Henry Clinton, doubtful of the farther fuccess of lord Cornwallis, apprehensive of an immediate affault on New York, and reafonably calculating the numbers in array against him, as very far fuperior to his own, loft fight for a time, of the dangerous fituation of lord Cornwallis and the army in Virginia. To complete the agitation of his mind, he was now trembling for his finking reputation, which had been feverely attacked in England. From thefe circumstances, his despondency was nearly equal to his irrefolution. Yet, apparent necessity awakened his energy for the defence of the city of New York; and every possible step was taken, to meet the combined troops in a manner becoming a British veteran commander.

Lord Cornwallis, with very different ideas, was parrying the attacks of the Americans then in Virginia, and preparing, as far as possible, for the relistance of stronger bodies of enemies. He was perfuaded, that general Washington and the count de Rochambeau, aided by a powerful French fleet, had deeper laid fystems, and were on the point of disclosing designs of higher magnitude, and more important consequences, than had ever been apprehended by fir Henry Clinton;

The variety of smaller skirmishes, retreats, reprifals, and unexpected rencounters, that took place on the different rivers and posts in Virginia, may at present be left, to advert more particularly to the difficulties lord Cornwallis had to contend with, and the dangers he had to combat, previous to the decision of his fortune in that quarter. He had for a time taken his stand at Portsmouth, but he left that station as soon as possible; and, according to orders from the commander in chief, concentrated his forces at York-Town and Gloucester, towards the close of summer, much against his own judgment.

We have feen, that by the indecision of general Clinton, the delay of reinforcements both by land and fea, and the general defection and difgust of the Virginians to any appearance of the authority of the crown of Britain, there were causes sufficient to discourage an officer who was ambitious to act with vigor and promptitude. But these were far from comprising the whole of the gloomy profpect which lay before lord Cornwallis. He had the highest reason to expect the approach of general Washington, accompanied by the experienced and renowned Rochambeau. At the fame time, he had wellgrounded expectations of a French fleet in the Chesapeake, to counteract any naval operations on the part of Britain. This combination of dangers, added to the inconvenient and indefensible post his lordship was impelled to take, reduced him to the most perplexed and embarrassed state of mind. Yet he supported himself with firmness and magnanimity, until new and inextricable difficulties led him to despair of the success of the campaign. This was apparent by the tenor of his letters, as well as by his general deportment, for some time previous to the catastrophe of the fatal day, which reduced a nobleman of the first rank, an officer of the highest military same and pride, to the condition of a prisoner.

APPENDIX

NOTE No. I. Page 16.

General BURGOYNE's Instructions to Lieutenant Colonel BAUM.

"THE object of your expedition is,—to try the affec"tion of the country; to disconcert the councils of the "enemy; to mount the Reidesel dragoons; to complete
"Petre's corps; and to obtain large supplies of cattle,
"horses, and carriages.

"The feveral corps, of which the inclosed is a lift, are to be under your command.

"The troops must take no tents; and what little baggage is carried by the officers, must be on their own battalion horses.

"You are to proceed from Batten Kill to Arlington, and take post there, till the detachment of the provincials, under the command of captain Sherwood, shall join you, from the southward.

"You are then to proceed to Manchester, where you "will again take post, so as to secure the pass of the mountains, on the road from Manchester to Rockingham; from thence you will detach the Indians and light troops "to the northward, towards Otter Creek. On their return, "and receiving intelligence that no enemy is upon the "Connecticut River, you will proceed by the road over the "mountains to Rockingham, where you will take post.

"This will be the most distant part of the expedition, and "must be proceeded upon with caution, as you will have "the defiles of the mountains behind you, which might "make a retreat dissicult. You must therefore endeavour "to be well informed of the force of the enemy's militia, "in the neighbouring country; should you find it may
"with prudence be effected, you are to remain there, while "the Indians and light troops are detached up the river:
"and you are afterwards to descend the river to Brattle"borough; and from that place, by the quickest march,
"you are to return by the great road to Albany.

"During your whole progrefs, your detachments are to " have orders to bring in to you, all horses fit to mount "the dragoons under your command, or to ferve as bat-" talion horses for the troops, together with as many faddles " and bridles as can be found. The number of horses " requifite, befides those necessary for mounting the regi-" ment of dragoons, ought to be thirteen hundred; if you " can bring more, for the use of the army, it will be so "much the better. Your parties are likewise to bring " in waggons and other convenient carriages, with as many draught oxen as will be necessary to draw them; and all " cattle fit for flaughter, (milch cows excepted, which are " to be left for the use of the inhabitants.) Regular re-" ceipts in the form hereto subjoined, are to be given in all " places, where any of the above articles are taken, to fuch fe persons as have remained in their habitations, and other-" wife complied with the terms of general Burgoyne's " manifesto; but no receipt to be given to such as are "known to be acting in the fervice of the rebels. As you " will have with you perfons perfectly acquainted with the " country, it may perhaps be advisable, to tax the several " districts with the portions of the feveral articles, and " limit the hours for the delivery; and should you find it " necessary to move before such delivery can be made, hostages of the most respectable people should be taken, to secure their following you the next day.

"All possible means are to be used to prevent plundersing. As it is probable that captain Sherwood, who is already detached to the southward, and will join you at Arlington, will drive a considerable quantity of cattle and horses to you, you will therefore send in these cattle to the army, with a proper detachment from Petre's corps, to cover them, in order to disencumber yourself; but you must always keep the regiment of dragoons compact. The dragoons themselves must ride, and take care of the horses of the regiment. Those horses that are destined for the use of the army, must be tied in strings of ten each, in order that one man may lead ten horses. You will give the unarmed men of Petre's corps to conduct them, and inhabitants whom you can trust.

"You must always keep your camps in good position, but at the same time where there is pasture; and you must have a chain of centinels around your cattle when grazing.

"Colonel Skeene will be with you as much as possible, "in order to distinguish the good subjects from the bad, to "procure the best intelligence of the enemy, and choose those people who are to bring me the accounts of your progress and success.

"When you find it necessary to halt a day or two, you "must always intrench the camp of the regiment of dragoons, in order never to risque an attack or affront from the enemy.

"As you will return with the regiment of dragoons "mounted, you must always have a detachment of captain "Frazer's or Petre's corps in front of the column, and the fame in the rear, in order to prevent your falling into an "ambuscade, when you march through the woods.

"You will use all possible means to make the country believe, that the troops under your command are the advanced corps of the army, and that it is intended to pass to Connecticut on the road to Boston: you will like infinuate, that the main army from Albany is to be joined at Springfield, by a corps of troops from Rhode Island.

"It is highly probable, that the corps under Mr. War"ner, now supposed to be at Manchester, will retreat before "you; but should they, contrary to expectation, be able to "collect in great force, and post themselves advantageous"ly, it is left to your discretion to attack them or not; al"ways bearing in mind, that your corps is too valuable "to let any considerable loss be hazarded on this occasion.

"Should any corps be moved from Mr. Arnold's main army, in order to interrupt your retreat, you are to take as firong a post as the country will afford, and fend the quickest intelligence to me; and you may depend on my making such movements as shall put the enemy best tween two fires, or otherwise effectually sustain you.

"It is imagined, the progress of the whole of this expedition may be effected in about a fortnight: but every movement of it must depend on your success in obtaining fuch supplies of provisions as will enable you to subsist for your return in this army, in case you can get no more.
And should not the army be able to reach Albany, before your expedition should be completed, I will find means to fend you notice of it, and give your route another direction.

"All persons acting in committees, or any officers under the direction of the congress, either civil or military, to be made prisoners.

"I heartily wish you success; and have the honor to be, "fir, your humble servant,

NOTE No. II. Page 19.

It was feveral years after the confederation of the thirteen American states, before Vermont was added to the union. The inhabitants kept up a long and severe altercation with the several governments, who claimed both territory and authority, until on the point of decision by the sword, both parties appealed to the general congress. This was a business that divided and embarrassed, and was not terminated until the agents of Britain interfered, and offered advantageous terms to the Vermontese, if they would withdraw from the confederated states, and become a province of Britain.

From their love of liberty, and their attachment to their country, these offers were rejected, though they complained heavily of the delays and evasions of the congress. Rough as their native mountains, and strong and slinty as the rocks that surrounded them, they bid defiance to dangers; and equally despised the intrigues of Britain, the subtersuges of the claimants on their territory, and the suspension in which they were held for a time by congress. They resisted obstinately the interferences and the claims of the neighbouring governments: their alienation from them, and their hatred to the state of New York in particular, daily increased: and in spite of all opposition, they continued their claims and supported their rights to be considered a free, independent, and separate state, entitled to the same privileges as the thirteen old colonics.

Colonel Ethan Allen, one of their principal leaders; a man of courage and ferocity, of pride without dignity, a writer without learning, a man of confequence merely from a bold prefumptive claim to a capacity for every thing; without education, and possessed of little intrinsic merit; wrote to congress on this occasion, and observed, "that

"Vermont has an indubitable right to agree to terms of a ceffation of hostilities with Great Britain, provided the United States persist in a rejection of her application for a union with them. But not disposed to yield to the overtures of the British government," he added, "I am as resolutely determined to defend the independence of Vermont, as congress are that of the United States; and rather than fail, will retire with hardy Green Mountain Boys into the desolate caverns of the mountains, and wage war with human nature at large."

After long fuspension and many impediments, congress thought proper, in order to prevent the effusion of blood among themselves, which this occasion threatened, to accede to the reasonable demands of these legitimate sons of freedom,—who chose delegates for congress, maintained their independence, and were a strong link in the consederated chain, against the encroachments and the power of Britain.*

The afflictions of this extraordinary lady did not terminate in America. By the affiduity of the physicians, and the tender care of a most affectionate wise, major Ackland partially recovered from his wounds in a short time, and was permitted to repair to New York. It was not long before his health was sufficiently restored to embark for England: but his wounds incurable, and his mind depressed, he was led to habits of intemperance, that soon put a period to his life.

^{*} A further description of the settlement and progress of the Hampshire Grants, may be seen at large in a late accurate history of Vermont, written by doctor Samuel Williams. This work is replete with moral and philosophical observations, which are honorary to the very sensible writer, and at once entertain and improve the reader.

The death of her husband, and the domestic afflictions of the family of lord Ilchester, the father of lady Ackland, all combined to overpower the heroism of a mind superior to most of her sex, and involved this unfortunate lady in a deep and irretrievable melancholy.

Governor Penn was the last proprietary governor of the state of Pennsylvania. After the revolution, different modes were adopted. The patent granted by the crown to the celebrated Penn, the sounder of that colony, included a vast territory; but the enormous claims of the family were extinguished by an act of the legislature of Pennsylvania. This was not in consequence of any political delinquency of the late governor, who had acquitted himself with ability and address, and retained his patriotism and attention to the interests of his country, to the end of the contest. The heirs of the family voluntarily relinquished their extensive claims, in consideration of a very handsome sum of money paid to the claimants by the legislature, in lieu of all quit-rents that might hereafter be demanded.

Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union between the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

The ftyle of this Confederacr shall be, "THE "UNITED STATES OF AMERICA."

ARTICLE II.

Each state retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in congress assembled.

ARTICLE III.

The faid states hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common desence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare; binding themselves to assist each other, against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever.

ARTICLE IV.

The better to fecure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different states in this union, the free inhabitants of each of these states, (paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted) shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states; and the people of each state shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other state; and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions, as the inhabitants thereof respectively; provided, that such restrictions shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any state, to any other state of which the owner is an inhabitant: provided also, that no imposition, duties, or restrictions, shall be laid by any state on the property of the United States, or either of them.

If any person guilty of, or charged with, treason, felony, or other high misdemeanors, in any state, shall slee from justice, and be found in any of the United States, he shall, upon demand of the governor or executive power of the state from which he sled, be delivered up, and removed to the state having jurisdiction of his offence.

Full faith and credit shall be given in each of these states, to the records, acts, and judicial proceedings, of the courts and magistrates of every other state.

ARTICLE V.

For the more convenient management of the general interests of the United States, delegates shall be annually appointed, in such manner as the legislature of each state shall direct, to meet in congress on the first Monday in November, in every year; with a power reserved to each state, to recal its delegates, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead for the remainder of the year.

No state shall be represented in congress by less than two, nor by more than seven members: and no person shall be capable of being a delegate for more than three years in any term of fix years: nor shall any person, being a delegate, be capable of holding any office under the United States, for which he, or another for his benefit, receives any salary, sees, or emolument of any kind.

In determining questions in the United States in congress assembled, each state shall have one vote.

Freedom of speech and debate in congress, shall not be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of congress: and the members of congress shall be protected in their persons from arrests and imprisonments, during the time of their going to and from, and attendance on, congress, except for treason, selony, or breach of the peace.

ARTICLE VI.

No state, without the consent of the United States in congress assembled, shall fend any embassy to, or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance, or treaty with, any king, prince, or state: nor shall any person, holding any office of profit or trust under the United States, or any of them, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state: nor shall the United States in congress assembled, or any of them, grant any title of nobility.

No two or more states shall enter into any treaty, confederation, or alliance, whatever between them, without the consent of the United States in congress assembled, specifying accurately the purposes for which the same is to be entered into, and how long it shall continue.

No state shall lay any imposts or duties, which may interfere with any stipulations in treaties entered into by the United States in congress assembled, with any king, prince, or state, in pursuance of any treaties already proposed by congress to the courts of France and Spain.

No veffels of war shall be kept up in time of peace by any state, except such numbers only as shall be deemed necessary by the United States in congress assembled, for the desence of such state or its trade: nor shall any body of sorces be kept up by any state, in time of peace, except such number only as, in the judgment of the United States in congress assembled, shall be deemed requisite to garrison the forts necessary for the desence of such state; but every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accounted; and shall provide, and constantly have ready for use, in public stores, a due number of field-pieces and tents, and a proper quantity of arms, ammunition, and camp equipage.

No state shall engage in any war, without the consent of the United States in congress assembled, unless such state be actually invaded by enemies, or shall have received certain advice of a resolution being formed by some nation of Indians to invade such state, and the danger is so imminent as not to admit of a delay, till the United States in congress affembled can be confulted; nor shall any state grant commissions to any ships or vessels of war, nor letters of marque or reprisal, except it be after a declaration of war by the United States in congress affembled, and then only against the kingdom or state, and the subjects thereof, against which war has been so declared, and under such regulations as shall be established by the United States in congress affembled; unless such state shall be insested by pirates; in which case, vessels of war may be sitted out for that occasion, and kept so long as the danger shall continue, or until the United States in congress affembled shall determine otherways.

ARTICLE VII.

When land forces are raised by any state for the common defence, all officers of, or under, the rank of colonel, shall be appointed by the legislature of each state respectively, by whom such forces shall be raised, or in such manner as such state shall direct; and all vacancies shall be silled up by the state which first made the appointment.

ARTICLE VIII.

All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence, or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several states, in proportion to the value of all land within each state, granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated, according to such mode as the United States in congress assembled shall, from time to time, direct and appoint. The taxes for paying that proportion, shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the several states, within the time agreed upon by the United States in congress assembled.

ARTICLE IX.

The United States in congress affembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the Sixth Article; or fending and receiving ambassadors; entering into treaties and alliances; (provided, that no treaty of commerce shall be made, whereby the legislative powers of the respective states, shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners, as their own people are fubjected to, or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any fpecies of goods or commodities whatfoever;) of establishing rules for deciding in all cases, what captures on land or water shall be legal, and in what manner prizes taken by land or naval forces in the fervice of the United States, shall be divided or appropriated; of granting letters of marque or reprifal in times of peace; appointing courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high feas, and eftablishing courts for receiving and determining finally, appeals in all cases of captures; (provided, that no member of congress shall be appointed a judge of any of the faid courts.)

The United States in congress assembled, shall also be the last refort on appeal, in all disputes and differences now subfifting, or that hereafter may arise, between two or more states, concerning boundary, jurisdiction, or any other cause whatever; which authority shall always be exercised in the manner following: - Whenever the legislative or executive authority, or lawful agent, of any state in controversy with another, shall present a petition to congress, stating the matter in question, and praying for a hearing, notice thereof shall be given by order of congress to the legislative or executive authority of the other state in controversy, and a day affigned for the appearance of the parties by their lawful agents, who shall then be directed to appoint by joint confent, commissioners or judges to constitute a court for hearing and determining the matter in question: but if they cannot agree, congress shall name three persons out of each of the United States; and from the lift of fuch persons each party shall alternately strike out one, the petitioners beginning, until the number shall be reduced to thirteen; and from that number not less than seven nor more than nine names, as congress shall direct, shall in the presence of congress be drawn out by lot; and the persons whose names shall be so drawn, or any five of them, shall be commissioners or judges, to hear and finally determine the controverfy, fo always as a major part of the judges who shall hear the cause thall agree in the determination; and if either party thall neglect to attend at the day appointed, without fliewing reasons, which Congress shall judge sufficient, or being present shall refuse to strike, the Congress shall proceed to nominate three persons out of each state, and the secretary of Congress shall strike in behalf of such party absent or refusing; and the judgment and sentence of the court to be appointed, in the manner before prescribed, shall be final and conclusive; and if any of the parties shall refuse to fubmit to the authority of fuch court, or to appear or defend their claim or cause, the court shall nevertheless proceed to pronounce fentence, or judgment, which shall in like manner be final and decifive, the judgment or fentence and other proceedings being in either case transmitted to Congress, and lodged among the acts of Congress for the security of the parties concerned; provided that every commiftioner, before he fits in judgment, shall take an oath to be administered by one of the judges of the supreme or superior court of the state, where the cause shall be tried, "well and truly to hear and determine the matter in question, according to the best of his judgment, without favour, affection, or hope of reward:"-provided also that no state shall be deprived of territory, for the benefit of the United States.

All controversies concerning the private right of soil claimed under different grants of two or more states, whose jurisdictions as they may respect such lands, and the states which passed such grants are adjusted, the said grants or either of them being at the same time claimed to have originated antecedent to such settlement of jurisdiction, shall on the petition of either party to the Congress of the United States be finally determined as near as may be in the same manner as is before prescribed for deciding disputes respecting territorial jurisdiction between different states.

The United States in Congress affembled shall also have the fole and exclusive right and power of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective states-fixing the standard of weights and measures throughout the United Statesregulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians, not members of any of the states, provided that the legislative right of any state within its own limits be not infringed or violated-establishing and regulating post offices from one state to another, throughout all the United States, and exacting fuch postage on the papers passing through the same as may be requisite to defray the expenses of the faid office-appointing all officers of the land forces, in the fervice of the United States, excepting regimental officers-appointing all the officers of the naval forces, and commissioning all officers whatever in the fervice of the United States-making rules for the government and regulation of the faid land and naval forces, and directing their operations.

The United States in Congress affembled shall have authority to appoint a committee, to sit in the recess of Congress, to be denominated "A Committee of the States," and to consist of one delegate from each State; and to appoint such other Committees and civil officers as may be necessary for managing the general affairs of the United States under their direction—to appoint one of their number to preside, provided that no person be allowed to serve in the office of President more than one year in any term of three years;—to ascertain the necessary sums of money to be raised for the service of the United States, and to appropriate and apply the same for defraying the public expenses—to borrow money, or emit bills on the credit of the United States, transmitting every half year to the respective states an account of the sums of money so borrowed or emitted-to build and equip a navy-to agree upon the number of land forces, and to make requisitions from each state for its quota, in proportion to the number of white inhabitants in fuch state; which requisition shall be binding, and thereupon the legislature of each state shall appoint the regimental officers, raise the men, and clothe, arm, and equip them in a foldier-like manner, at the expense of the United States; and the officers and men fo clothed, armed and equipped, shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the United States in Congress affembled :- But if the United States, in Congress affembled shall, on consideration of circumstances, judge proper that any state should not raife men, or fhould raife a fmaller number than its quota, and that any other state should raise a greater number of men than the quota thereof, fuch extra number shall be raifed, officered, clothed, armed, and equipped, in the fame manner as the quota of fuch state, unless the legislature of fuch state shall judge that such extra number cannot be fafely spared out of the same, in which case they shall raife, officer, clothe, arm, and equip as many of fuch extra number as they judge can be fafely spared. And the officers and men fo clothed, armed, and equipped, shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the United States in Congress affembled.

The United States in Congress assembled shall never engage in a war, nor grant letters of marque and reprisal, in time of peace, nor enter into any treaties or alliances, nor coin money, nor regulate the value thereof, nor ascertain the sums and expenses necessary for the defence and welfare of the United States, or any of them; nor emit bills, nor borrowmoney on the credit of the United States; nor appropriate money, nor agree upon the number of vessels of war, to be built or purchased, or the number of land or sea forces to be raised, nor appoint a commander in chief of the army or navy, unless nine states assent to the same; nor shall a question on any other point, except for adjourning from day to day, be determined, unless by the votes of a majority of the United States in Congress assembled.

The Congress of the United States shall have power to adjourn to any time within the year, and to any place within the United States, so that no period of adjournment be for a longer duration than the space of fix months, and shall publish the journal of their proceedings monthly, except such parts therof relating to treaties, alliances, or military operations, as in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the delegates of each state on any question shall be entered on the journal, when it is desired by any delegate; and the delegates of a state, or any of them, at his or their request, shall be furnished with a transcript of the said journal, except such parts as are above excepted, to lay before the legislatures of the several states.

ARTICLE X.

The committee of the states or any nine of them, shall be authorized to execute, in the recess of Congress, such of the powers of Congress as the United States in Congress assembled, by the consent of nine states, shall from time to time think expedient to vest them with; provided that no power be delegated to the said committee, for the exercise of which, by the articles of consederation, the voice of nine states in the Congress of the United States assembled is requisite.

ARTICLE XI.

Canada acceding to this confederation, and joining in the measures of the United States, shall be admitted into, and entitled to all the advantages of this Union; but no other colony shall be admitted into the same, unless such admission be agreed to by nine states.

ARTICLE XII.

All bills of credit emitted, monies borrowed, and debts contracted by, or under the authority of Congress, before the assembling of the United States, in pursuance of the present confederation, shall be deemed and considered as a charge against the United States, for payment and satisfaction whereof the said United States, and the public saith are hereby solemnly pledged.

ARTICLE XIII.

Every state shall abide by the determinations of the United States in Congress assembled, on all questions which by this confederation are submitted to them. And the articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed by every state, and the union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them; unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every state.

These articles shall be proposed to the Legislatures of all the United States, to be considered, and if approved of by them, they are advised to authorize their delegates to ratify the same in the Congress of the United States; which being done, the same shall become conclusive.

By order of Congress,

NOTE No. VI. Page 136.

The name of Thomas Paine has become fo generally known both in Europe and America, that a few strictures on his character may not be uninteresting.

Mr. Paine was a native of England, but he had refided in America fome time before the American Revolution took place. He warmly advocated the cause of the Colonies, and wrote in the spirit of the times with much applause. Several of his bold publications displayed a considerable share of wit and ingenuity, though his arguments were not always conclusive. His Crisis, his Common Sense, and some other writings were well adapted to animate the people, and to invigorate their resolutions in opposition to the measures of the British administration.

Though not generally confidered a profound politician, yet as it was then thought he wrote on principles honorable to the human character, his celebrity was extensive in America, and was afterwards differentiated in England; and his merit as a writer for a time appreciated by a work entitled the Rights of Man, which was replete with just and dignified fentiments on a subject so interesting to society.

His celebrity might have been longer maintained, and his name have been handed down with applause, had he not afterwards have left the line of politics, and presumed to touch on theological subjects of which he was grossly ignorant, as well as totally indifferent to every religious observance as an individual, and in some instances his morals were censured.

Perfecuted in England he repaired to France, fome time before monarchy was subverted in that nation. There, after listening to the indigested rant of insides of antecedent date, and learning by rote the jargon of the modern French literati, who zealously laboured in the field of scepticism, he attempted to undermine the sublime doctrines of the gospel, and annihilate the Christian system.* Here he betrayed his weakness and want of principle, in blasphemous scurrilities and impious raillery, that at once sunk his character, and disgusted every rational and sober mind.

It is no apology that this was done at a period, when all principle feemed to lie prostrate beneath the confusions and despotism of the Robespierrian reign. It is true, this insignificant theologian, who affected to hold in contempt all religion, or any expectations of a future state, was at this time trembling under the terrors of the guillotine; and while imprisoned, he endeavoured to ingratiate himself

[&]quot;Till his exhausted quiver yielding none,

[&]quot;He gleans the blunted shafts that have recoiled, into the favor of the ruling faction of France, by levelling his farcastic pen against opinions that had been for ages held facred among mankind.

The effusions of infidelity, entitled the Age of Reason, would not have been thought worthy of a serious resutation, had not much industry been employed, to disseminate this worthless pamphlet among the common classes of mankind. The young, the ignorant, the superficial and licentious, pleased with the attempt to let loose the wild passions of men by removing so efficient a guard as is contained in the sacred scriptures, this pernicious work was by them sought for, and read with avidity. This consideration drew out the pens of men of character and ability, to antidote the posson of licentious wit.

No one had more merit in the effort than the learned, pious, and excellent Dr. Richard Watson, bishop of Landass. His works have always been read with pleasure and applause, by every man of genius, virtue, and taste, in whatever branch of literature he drew his pen. His observations on the writings of Paine, his letters to Mr. Gibbon, with a concluding address to young gentlemen, will be read with delight and improvement by every person who adores the benignity of divine government, long after the writings of infidels of talent and ingenuity are sunk into oblivion.

Men of discernment are ever better pleased with truth, in its most simple garb, than with the sophisticated, though elegant style of wit and raillery, decorated for deception; and the name of Voltaire, with other wits and philosophers of the same description will be forgotten, and even the celebrated Gibbon will cease to be admired by the real friends of the Christian dispensation, while its desenders will be held in veneration to the latest ages.

The lovers of liberty on reasonable and just principles, were exceedingly hurt, that a man so capable as was Mr. Paine, of exhibiting political truth in a pleafing garb, and defending the rights of man with eloquence and precision, should profittute his talents to ridicule divine revelation, and destroy the brightest hopes of a rational and immortal agent.

Mr. Paine out-lived the storms of revolution both in America and in France, and he may yet add one instance more of the versatility of human events, by out-living his own false opinions and foolish attempts to break down the barriers of religion, and we wish he may by his own pen, endeavour to antidote some part of the possons he has spread.

NOTE No. VII, Page 183.

The count Kosciusko was a gentleman of family without the advantages of high fortune. His education, perfon, and talents, recommended him to the king of Poland, by whom he was patronized and employed in a military line.

Early in life he became attached to a lady of great beauty, belonging to one of the first families in the kingdom. The inequality of fortune prevented his obtaining consent from her parents to a union, though the affections of the lady were equally strong with his own. The lovers agreed on an elopement, and made an attempt to retire to France; purfued and overtaken by the father of the lady, a fierce rencounter enfued. When Kosciusko found he must either surrender the object of his affection, or take the life of her parent, humanity prevailed over his paffion, he returned the fword to its fcabbard, and generously relinquished the beautiful daughter to her distressed father, rather than become the murderer of the person who gave being to fo much elegance and beauty, now plunged in terror and despair from the tumult of contending passions of the most foft and amiable nature.

This unfortunate termination of his hopes was one means of lending this celebrated hero to the affiltance of America. Wounded by the difappointment, and his delicacy hurt by becoming the topic of general conversation on an affair of gallantry, he obtained leave from his sovereign to retire from Poland. He soon after repaired to America, and offered himself a volunteer to general Washington, was honorably appointed, and by his bravery and humanity rendered essential services to the United States. After the peace took place between Great Britain and America, he returned to his own distressed country.*

His fufferings and his bravery in his struggles to rescue his native country from the usurpations of neighbouring tyrants, until the ruin of the kingdom of Poland and the surrender of Warsaw, are amply detailed in European history. Wounded, imprisoned, and cruelly used, his distresses were in some degree ameliorated by the compassion of a Russian lady, the wise of general Chra-cozazow, who had been a prisoner and set at liberty by the count. This lady could not prevent his being sent to Petersburgh, where he was confined in a fortress near the city; but he surmounted imprisonment, sickness, misery, and poverty, and afterwards revisited America, where he was relieved and rewarded, as justice, honor, and gratitude required.

The cruel oppressions long suffered by the kingdom of Ireland from the haughty superiority of British power, induced the wretched inhabitants to avail themselves of this invitation, and to resort by thousands to America after the peace took place between Great Britain and the United States. After this, the confusions and distractions in Ireland arose to such a height as rendered a residence there too insupportable for description. The miserable inhabitants who escaped the sword, the burnings, and the massacre of the English, had slattered themselves, that if they could retreat from their native country, they should receive a welcome reception to an asylum to which they had formerly been invited, by the congressional body who directed the affairs of America. There they justly thought their industry might have been cherished, their lives and properties be secure, and their residence rendered quiet; but a check was put to emigration for a time, by an alien law enacted by Congress in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight.

This was very contrary to the policy and to the principles expressed by governor Trumbull of Connecticut to Baron R. J. Van der Capellen, "Seigneur du Pol, Membre "des Nobles de la Provence D'Overyssel, &c." dated Lebanon, August 31, 1779.

He observes, that "the climate, the foil, and the pro-" ductions of a continent extending from the thirtieth to "the forty-fifth degree of latitude, and in longitude an " unknown width, are various beyond description, and the " objects of trade confequently unbounded. " fcarce a manufacture, whether in the useful or ornament-" al part of life, of which you will not here find the mate-" rials, collected, as it were, in an immense magazine. In " every requifite for naval armaments we abound, our for-" ests yielding prodigious quantities of timber and spars; "our mountains, vast mines of iron, copper, and lead; " and our fields producing ample crops of flax and hemp. " Provisions of all kinds are raised in much greater quan-"tities than are necessary for our own consumption; and "our wheat, our rye, our cattle, and our pork, yield to " none in the world for quality.

acres, situated most advantageously for future business, selling for three hundred guineas English, i. e. little more than fix pence sterling the acre. Our interests and our laws teach us to receive strangers from every quarter of the globe, with open arms. The poor, the unfortunate, the oppressed from every country, will here find a ready afylum; and by uniting their interests with ours, enjoy, in common with us, all the blessings of liberty and plenty.
Neither difference of nation, of language, of manners, or of religion, will lessen the cordiality of their reception, among a people whose religion teaches them to regard

NOTE No. IX. Page 276.

Governor Trumbull observed thus: "The only obsta-" cle which I foresee to the settlement of foreigners in the "country, will be the taxes, which must inevitably for a " time run high, for the payment of the debts contracted "during the present war. These, indeed, will be much " lightened by the care which has been taken, to confine " these debts as much as possible among ourselves, and by " emitting a paper currency in place of borrowing from " abroad. But this method, though it fecures the country " from being drained hereafter, of immense sums of solid " coin, which can never return, has exposed us to a new and "very disagreeable embarrassment, by its monstrous de-" preciation. An evil which had its rife in, and owes all "its rapid increase to the single cause of our not having " provided at a fufficiently early period, for its reduction " and payment by taxes. This meafure was indeed ren-" dered impracticable, at the proper time, by the radical " derangement of the fystem of government, and confe-" quently of revenue in many of the United States; and its "necessary delay till the removal of these impediments, gave time for avarice and suspicion to unite in sapping the foundations of our internal credit."

He adds, "I am no advocate for internal or foreign "loans. In my opinion, they are like cold water in a "fever, which allays the disease for a moment, but soon "causes it to rage with a redoubled violence; temporary "alleviations, but ultimately real additions to the burden. "The debts which we have already contracted, or may "hereafter be necessitated to contract abroad, I have not a "doubt, but will be paid with the utmost punctuality and "honor; and there can be no surer foundation of credit, "than we possess in the rapidly increasing value and importance of our country.

"In fhort, it is not fo much my wish that the United States should gain credit among foreign nations, for the loan of money, as that all nations, and especially your countrymen in Holland, should be made acquainted with the real state of the American war. The importance and greatness of this rising empire, the suture extensive value of our commerce, the advantages of colonization, are objects which need only to be known, to command your attention, protection, and support.

"Give me leave most sincerely to express my grief, that the efforts you have made for the removal of oppression in your own country, and for extending the blessings of liberty and plenty to the poor, should have met with so ungrateful a return of persecution and insult. Unhappy state of man! where opulence and power conspire to load the poor, the desenceless, and the innocent, with accumulated misery; where an unworthy few join to embitter the life of half their fellow men, that they may wallow in the excess of luxurious debauch, or shine in the splendid trappings of folly."
